Mr. BUCK, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3, a bill (H. R. No. 6096) extending the punishment provided for in section 4596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, placed on the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL PAY OF CENSUS SUPERVISORS.

Mr. PRESCOTT, from the Committee on the Census, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6097) for additional pay to the supervisors of the tenth census; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LITTLE ROCK AND FORT SMITH RAILROAD.

Mr. REED. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred sundry bills relating to the forfeiture of land-grants to certain railroads, having had the same under consideration, have directed me to report in part as to the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad Company.

The SPEAKER. What recommendation is proposed?

Mr. REED. This report is a statement of facts in relation to the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad Company, which seems to have complied with the provisions of the grant, but owing to the fact of the question being before Congress the company has been unable to obtain patents which had already been indicated by the Secretary of the Interior, who desired that Congress should express an early opinion as to the state of facts in order that he might, with all courtesy toward Congress, dispose of the matter. The committee have come to the unanimous conclusion that there is no reason why the patents should not be issued; and they now report that state of facts.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed and laid on the table.

COMPENSATION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE GAUGERS.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 5642) to define the limitation of compensation of internal-revenue gaugers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SILAS Q. HOWE.

Mr. CARLISLE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. No. 565) for the relief of Silas Q. Howe, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. The Select Committee on the Law respecting the Election of President and Vice-President have directed me to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 5569) to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution respecting the election of President and Vice-President of the United States. I ask that the bill and report be printed and recommitted. Our object is to call the bill up in the near future as a privileged matter; and hence we desire not to place it upon the House Calendar, but to retain control of it in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill as amended and the accompanying report will be ordered to be printed and recommitted.

GEORGE G. COBB, DECEASED.

Mr. ERRETT, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5536) to reissue a Treasury draft originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in Alabama, deceased, to J. E. Cobb, custodian of the minor children of said decedent; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER The call of committees for reports has been concluded.

SABINE PASS COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6098) to establish a collection district at Sabine Pass, in the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGIA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. STEPHENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H.R.No. 6099) to transfer certain counties from the southern judicial district to the northern district in the State of Georgia, and to divide the northern district in said State into two, to be known as the western and eastern divisions of said district, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and are hereby, respectfully requested to make provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the ensuing fiscal year for the clerk of the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills, as one of the annual clerks provided for in that bill, at the same compensation as is now allowed the clerk of the Committee on Commerce.

PERSONS CHARGED WITH CRIMES AS WITNESSES.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6100) to amend an act entitled "An act to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses in the United States and Territorial courts," approved March 16, 1878; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MARY SWEENY.

Mr. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6101) for the relief of Mary Sweeny; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS COMMITTEE.

Mr. POUND. I ask by unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Lands may be permitted to hold its sessions during the sittings of the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ISA C. REMSHART.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, (for his colleague, Mr. BLACK, who is confined to his house by illness,) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6102) for the relief of Isa C. Remshart; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr BELMONT. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce a resolution for reference.

Mr. RUSSELL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope there will be no objection to my colleague submitting a resolution for reference only.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the regular order of business.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the tariff-commission bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2315) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, every gentleman who has spoken on this question has conceded the necessity for a revision of the tariff. I can understand the position of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] and others who oppose the passage of the "bill to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff." They desire a revision of the tariff because they think the duties are too high. The average on dutiable articles is about 45 per cent. ad valorem according to the existing law. But I do not know why the advocates of this bill desire revision. I would like to obtain some information on this subject.

Do the friends of this bill desire to revise the tariff by increasing the average rate of duties; or do they desire to decrease the average rate of duties? If the former, I would ask this question: Do you desire to increase the revenues of the Government, or will increased duties decrease the revenue? If you desire to increase the revenues of the Government, or, by delay, desire to preserve the present rates, I call attention to the fact that the present revenues exceed the Government's necessities by about one hundred and fifty million dollars annually. I assume that the advocates of this bill desire to revise the tariff by increasing the existing rates of duties, and their theories lead to the further conclusion that increased taxes or tariffs will produce increased revenue.

If I am wrong in this let any gentleman on the other side of the House correct me. There is already a bill largely increasing certain duties, which has received the approval of a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] the passage of which, I understand from the gentleman's speech, is to be pressed at this session.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it not the gentleman's theory, and that of free-traders generally, that to reduce duties on imports would increase importations and consequently increase revenues?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer by asking whether that is the gentleman's theory?

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir. It is my theory to this extent, that at first importations are increased, and revenue also, and consequently this would not relieve the present exigency of which the gentleman complains; but ultimately by destroying the earnings and consumptive power of our producing classes, importations fall off, revenue shrinks, and the Government becomes bankrupt or presently insolvent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will let the gentleman's answer stand for his view of the question. I will answer for myself further on in my argument.

THE SURPLUS IN THE TREASURY.

The surplus revenues of the Government now amount to about $3 a head for every man, woman, and child in the country. The amount of such surplus revenue for each Congressional district is over $500,000 per annum. Every family of five persons is required by existing laws to pay to the General Government about $15 a year beyond the necessities of the Government, and this, too, in addition to the revenue necessary for its support, and all State, county, and local taxation.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report estimates the revenues for the present fiscal year at $400,000,000. This fiscal year will close June 30, 1882, and hence the whole amount of this vast sum will soon have been collected. This will amount to an average tax on the people of each Congressional district of $1,365,000 for this year for the support of the General Government in addition to all direct taxes imposed under State authority. This Federal taxation amounts to $8 a head to the whole fifty millions of population. A man who has a wife and three children, the average family, is required to pay under existing laws, and does pay through the articles which he consumes, $40 a year for the support of the General Government.

Mark you, the General Government does not levy its taxes upon the principle that every person should pay according to his abilities to pay. Adam Smith over a hundred years ago laid down the following maxim for equal taxation:

> The subjects of every State ought to contribute to the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State.

Our State governments have adopted as nearly as possible this maxim in levying taxes for State, county, and local purposes. But the Federal system of taxation is based solely upon consumption. The poor man pays in proportion to what he eats and wears. The rich do the same. If the tastes and comforts of life of all the people were the same, Federal taxes would fall upon all exactly alike. The tax would then practically be so much per capita.

As it is, the difference between the amount of Federal taxes paid by the poor and the rich is exactly in proportion to their respective consumption of the necessaries and luxuries of life, and not in proportion to their abilities to pay.

These considerations will remind the people how nearly equal per capita the burdens of the Federal Government are imposed upon them. A tax which requires the average family to pay $40 a year is too onerous to be borne without serious results to the country. According to the census report for 1880 on the iron and steel industry, the average wages of skilled and unskilled laborers in that branch of business was $393.51. These wages are perhaps higher than paid in any other branch of industry. To require each laborer having a family of five persons to pay $40 is to exact more than a tithe of all he earns for the support of the General Government.

Do the advocates of the tariff-commission bill desire to continue these burdens on the people by postponing action; and when the commission finally reports will they advocate increased burdens? These are important questions which I would like to have answered.

It seems to me that a hundred and fifty millions of surplus revenues, a Treasury already overburdened with taxes wrung from labor and present depression in manufacturing and other business interests, should admonish the majority in Congress that the immediate reduction of taxation is imperatively demanded.

A measure of relief and reduction of taxes should have been passed ere this. Congress has been in session about five months, and little or nothing has been accomplished. No committee has as yet reported a bill to reduce taxation. And the pending bill postpones the subject until next December in order to get the facts.

Sir, we have facts enough before us to enable us to reduce taxation. Delay means to continue existing burdens which ought to have been reduced months ago.

Speaking of the onerous taxation now borne by the people, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Folger, used the following language in his message to Congress last December:

> The result upon the public revenue is to embarrass this Department in disposing of the surplus in a lawful way and with regard to economy.

And further:

> Meanwhile the daily receipts from the community by the Treasury continue, the surplus over its needs increases, and money lies idle. It seems that the plan most just for giving relief is to reduce taxation, and thereby diminish receipts and surplus. (Executive Document No. 2, page 18.)

How has this wise and timely recommendation of Secretary Folger been met by his party in Congress?

The Republican caucus has resolved not to reduce or abolish taxes on whisky or tobacco, and the Committee on Ways and Means of this House have stricken out of their committee bill the clause requiring the investigation and revision of "the existing system of internal-revenue laws," and have embodied their declared policy in a bill to refer the tariff question to a commission of nine civilian experts, to report next December. To report what? Merely the facts upon which there may be based hereafter, no one knows when, a revision of the customs duties.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs Congress that the surplus revenues embarrass the Government, and the money lies idle in the Treasury. He recommends the reduction of taxation. The growing business depression in the country, the strikes which are every day announced, the closing of many great manufacturing establishments, and the reduction of the days and hours of labor, all remind us that the best interests of the country demand the immediate reduction of Federal taxation. But the dominant party in Congress confesses its inability to afford relief; it asks time to consider; it wants more facts, greater delay, more surplus revenue, more idle funds in the Treasury, and continued burdens upon the people.

REVISION OF TARIFF DEMANDED.

In view of the present condition of the Treasury, its surplus revenues, the enormous burden of Federal taxation, and the depressed condition of many of the business interests of the country, I am in favor of a revision of the tariff and the internal-revenue laws; not next winter, or next year, or by the next Congress, but now, at this session. The Committee on Ways and Means should have reported a revised tax bill two months ago, instead of the pending bill to create a roving commission to gather facts and report next December.

Why has not this committee reported a bill to reduce taxes? I will let the honorable gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who has reported this bill as the organ of the Committee on Ways and Means, answer this question. I am afraid I might do him and the committee injustice if I should undertake to formulate their excuse in my own language.

THE SUBJECT TOO VAST FOR THE COMMITTEE.

The honorable gentleman, in his speech in this House on the 28th of last March, explaining why the Committee on Ways and Means had not reported a bill for the revision of the tariff in the ordinary way, said:

It has become too vast a subject for any committee to grasp in the ordinary course of business. Your Committee on Ways and Means, chiefly composed of politicians, does not win the confidence of the country in dealing with exclusively business interests.

I venture to say that not a tariff bill could be presented here by any number of men upon this floor now getting together and preparing such a bill that would not call forth complaints of the country that some interest had been omitted, injuriously affected, others destroyed, and still others unduly benefited. That would be inevitable, because the information we get in ordinary forms is partial and the result of personal interests in contradistinction to national interests.

What would you gain if, as proposed by some gentlemen, we should combine with this expert commission, so called, a representation of the Senate and the House, having three members of the House, two Senators, and four civilians? The same objections exist, because the majority of the elements of the commission would be subject to the same prejudices and the same political influences as our own committees are here, and their action would not advance us a step in the revision beyond that of the civilian commission.

An additional reason for our objection to both the first and the second methods which I have named is this: our Congressional election comes off this year. How many members of this House are willing to devote their entire time from now till December next in the pursuit of these inquiries? How cool and persistent would they be in that pursuit during an exciting electoral contest involving their own political fortunes? Sir, every day of the vacation is required for the commission to reach results. Your Committee on Ways and Means—and I should have given this reason before—devotes an hour and a half twice a week, or three hours a week, to the consideration of this question. Suppose they devoted the same time each day for six days in the week to this sole work, that would be but nine hours a week for this far-reaching investigation.

This is a most remarkable statement, or series of statements. When our fathers adopted the Constitution of the United States they provided (article 1, section 7, clause 1) that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." But they never anticipated such a decline in public intelligence as would result in the election of a House of Representatives incapable of originating a revenue bill "in the ordinary course of business." If, in the heat of debate, I had ever been betrayed into making so serious a charge against the Republican majority in this Congress, I would have taken the first opportunity thereafter to make a public retraction.

In all probability my words "would have been taken down," or the Speaker, in his zeal to preserve order, might have "named" me—whatever that may imply! At least I should have fully expected to have been called to order by some member on the other side, who would have hurled back upon me the offensive language, denied indignantly the allegation, and defied the allegator.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCKENZIE] took occasion to criticise rather sarcastically the Committee on Ways and Means in his speech in this House a few days ago. I confess that I thought the gentleman bore down on the committee too severely. But he was mild, and in fact complimentary to the committee, compared with the assault made upon it by its own organ. The gentleman from Iowa says the Committee on Ways and Means is "chiefly composed of politicians."

I never would have believed it had not the honorable gentleman himself, in his official utterance, so frankly confessed it.

"For he himself has said it!" Will any other member of that honorable committee make the humiliating confession?

Chiefly composed of politicians! I thought the committee was composed of statesmen, any one of whom could originate a revenue bill in less time than it requires to prepare a speech on the tariff.

The other excuses offered by the honorable gentleman may be satisfactory to him and to the Committee on Ways and Means, but will hardly be to the country. "Our Congressional elections come off this year." It is more important to look after "their own political fortunes" than to relieve the enormous burdens of taxation from the people. But the concluding reason for a tariff commission, the one which the honorable gentleman apologized for withholding so long, is the most remarkable of all. He says: "Your Committee on Ways and Means devotes an hour and a half twice a week, or three hours a week, to the consideration of this question!"

Is that all? No wonder nothing has been done. Three hours a week to this "far-reaching investigation." That will be news to their constituents, who have supposed that their faithful Representatives were here consuming midnight oil, devising measures for their relief, and were spending their days defying the malaria of Washington and fighting wicked Democrats. Not so. This committee is "chiefly composed of politicians," who devote three hours a week to the great and far-reaching tariff question, and then, finding the subject too vast to grasp, "in the ordinary course of business," bring in a bill to authorize the appointment of nine civilian experts "to grasp" the subject for them.

But suppose this bill should pass, the nine civilian experts appointed and started on their search for facts. They will have a messenger to run down witnesses and a stenographer to take down the questions and answers, and the Public Printing Office in which to print them. They will go to Philadelphia, to New York, to Lowell, to Lynn, to Boston, Pittsburgh, Chicago, and Cincinnati, and perhaps to Georgia, for I understand that "there are some important iron interests in Georgia."

When Congress reassembles next December, and the Ways and Means Committee, fresh from "an exciting electoral contest, involving their own political fortunes," shall have returned to their elegant quarters in the committee-room, they will find piled up on their long table the facts collected by this roving commission, printed in the best style of the Government Printing Office, together with the full reports of the tenth census, covering 18,000 printed quarto pages and waiting to be "grasped" by the politicians, who chiefly compose the committee, chiefly referring, of course, to the majority of the committee. When the "grasping" of those stubborn facts begins, "in the ordinary course of business," and the committee "devotes an hour and a half twice a week or three hours a week to the consideration of this question," what will be the probable length of time required by them to complete this far-reaching investigation? The session will last but three months. In twelve weeks after we reassemble in December next our legislative days as members of the Forty-seventh Congress will have been numbered. At the end of that time the Committee on Ways and Means will have spent just thirty-six hours in "grasping" the facts in this "far-reaching investigation," that is if they proceed "in the ordinary course of business," and I presume the usual programme will be pursued. It would be taxing our credulity too severely to ask us to suppose for one moment that a tariff bill would be evolved, reported, and passed during these thirty-six hours which the Committee on Ways and Means could devote to the subject during the short session of this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, do you not now begin to "grasp" this far-reaching investigation? It is certain to reach far beyond the official life-time of this Congress. I may therefore be permitted to suggest the following as the proper title of this bill, namely: "A bill to indefinitely postpone the revision of the question of the tariff." And as the subject must go over to be dealt with by the next Congress, I trust that the people, in the election of our successors, will keep in view the fact that those who urge the reference of the tariff question to a commission acknowledge their inability to originate revenue bills, and will send as their successors gentlemen who can and will perform their duties under the Constitution.

COMPOSITION OF THE COMMISSION.

If we must have a commission appointed by the President, I shall insist that its members should represent as equally as possible all the great interests of the country.

Section 1 of the bill provides for a commission, to be called the tariff commission, to consist of nine members; and section 2 provides that they shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from civil life, and shall receive for their services $10 per day while engaged in active duty, and their actual traveling and other necessary expenses. They shall have power to employ a stenographer and a messenger.

Section 3 is as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, upon a scale of justice to all interests; and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it, said commission, in the prosecution of its inquiries, is empowered to visit such different portions and sections of the country as it may deem advisable.

I concede that all these interests should be fairly considered, and in order that they may be fairly considered they should be fairly represented on the commission. This representation should be, as far as possible, in accordance with the number of persons engaged in each interest and the importance of such interest. I would therefore suggest the following amendment to the bill:

The President shall appoint as members of said commission well recognized representatives of the various interests of the country as follows:

Four commissioners to represent agricultural interests.

One commissioner to represent the persons employed in the building and operating of railroads.

One commissioner to represent the persons employed in the manufacture of iron and steel and of cotton and woolen goods.

One commissioner to represent the manufacturers of such goods.

One commissioner to represent the persons employed in other mechanical occupations.

One commissioner to represent the manufacturers of agricultural implements, stoves, and the various kinds of machinery.

I have put the agricultural interests down as entitled to four members of the commission. In this connection I call attention to the most reliable data that I can procure. The Commissioner of the Census at my request has furnished me the information contained in the following letters:

OCCUPATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES 1870–'80.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1882.

SIR: Your letter of the 10th instant is received. In reply I beg to state as follows, namely: number of persons engaged in the railroad business, 403,153; number of hands employed in the manufacture of agricultural implements, 49,180; lumber, sawed, 225,288; iron and steel, 140,978; cotton goods, (including the administrative force,) 187,714; woolen goods, 86,448; carpets, 20,437; felt goods, 1,524; worsted goods, 18,803; wool hats, 5,446; hosiery and knit goods, 28,804.

The above figures represent the greatest number of hands employed at any one time during the census year. They are preliminary figures, however, and still subject to such revision as the office may deem necessary by reason of the receipt of additional information. I regret to be unable at the present time to give you the figures requested for the other industries, as they have not yet been compiled.

Very respectfully,

C. W. SEATON,
Superintendent of Census.

Hon. W. M. SPRINGER, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 19, 1882.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request I have the honor to submit the following estimate of the increase since 1870 in the number of persons engaged in occupations classed under the four general heads of agriculture, professions and professional services, trade and transportation, and manufactures, mechanical and mining industries:

Classes of occupations.	1870.	1880, (estimated.)
Agriculture	5,922,471	7,699,212
Professions and professional services	2,684,793	3,490,230
Trade and transportation	1,191,238	1,548,609
Manufactures, mechanical and mining industries	2,707,421	3,519,647
All occupations	12,505,923	16,257,698

The above estimate is based on the ratio of increase in the total population of the United States as returned at the census of 1880 over that of 1870, applied to the number of persons engaged in each of the four general classes of occupations, as obtained from the census report of 1870.

Very respectfully,

C. W. SEATON,
Superintendent of Census.

Hon. W. M. SPRINGER,
United States House of Representatives.

AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

From the foregoing letters it will be seen that the persons engaged in agriculture number nearly one-half of all the occupations of the country. It is therefore only fair that they should have four representatives of their interests on the commission. I wish to call special attention to the interests which the farmers and producers of the country have in the revision and reduction of the tariff.

As I have suggested, the persons engaged in agricultural occupations number nearly one-half of all engaged in industrial pursuits, and these persons represent nearly one-half of the whole population. They contribute over 80 per cent. of all our exports, as will appear by the following table taken from the last annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics for 1881, page 41:

Values of exports from the United States of domestic merchandise, and of the exports of the products of agriculture, and the percentage which the exports of such products bear to the total value of exports of domestic merchandise, for the years mentioned.

Year ended June 30—	Value of exports of domestic merchandise.	Value of exports of products of domestic agriculture.	Per cent. of products of agriculture.
	Dollars.	Dollars.	Per ct.
1870	455,208,341	361,188,483	79.34
1871	478,115,292	368,466,011	77.07
1872	476,421,478	368,796,625	77.41
1873	575,227,017	446,900,004	77.69
1874	633,339,368	501,371,501	79.16
1875	559,237,638	430,306,570	76.95
1876	594,917,715	456,113,515	76.67
1877	632,980,854	459,734,148	72.63
1878	695,749,930	536,192,873	77.07
1879	699,538,742	546,476,703	78.12
1880	823,946,353	683,010,976	82.90
1881	883,925,947	729,650,016	82.55

The importance of these statistics cannot be overestimated. Large as these exports are, they bear a small proportion to the value of the total productions of agriculture. The cereal productions for the year 1879, compiled from the census of 1880, were as follows:

Indian corn	bushels	1,754,861,535
Wheat	bushels	459,479,505
Oats	bushels	407,858,999
Barley	bushels	44,113,495
Rye	bushels	19,831,595
Cotton	bales	5,737,257
Tobacco	pounds	472,661,159

The foregoing represents only the leading products of the farm. The average value of the crop of Indian corn for the past ten years has been over $500,000,000 each year, or over $5,000,000,000 for the ten years. The aggregate value of the wheat produced during the past ten years was $3,774,000,000, or $377,400,000 per annum. Oats, $1,110,000,000 for ten years, or $111,000,000 per annum. The barley produced was worth $24,000,000 a year; rye, $12,000,000; buckwheat, nearly $7,000,000; potatoes, $73,000,000; hay, $330,000,000; cotton, $240,000,000, and tobacco, $22,000,000.

Mr. ATKINS. As the gentleman is alluding to the value of the wheat crop of the United States and the number of bushels raised annually, it might be well to inquire what number of bushels was consumed by the manufacturing States proper, to wit, the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, over and above their own product in 1881.

Mr. SPRINGER. My attention has not been directed especially to that fact.

Mr. ATKINS. The nine States mentioned, in 1881, raised 80,192,904 bushels, and at the rate of five bushels per capita of the population, those nine States lacked only about 10,000,000 of bushels of raising enough to supply their own demands. Thus showing that the farmers of the West, in the great wheat-growing sections of the country, found scarcely any home market whatever for their large surplus of wheat.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thank my distinguished friend from Tennessee for the valuable statement which he has made.

In Mr. Spofford's valuable almanac for 1882, page 32, will be found a table showing the leading agricultural crops in Europe and in the United States. From this table it will appear that the United States produced more wheat than Russia, France, or any other government in the world. Of course our country is unrivaled in the production of Indian corn, there being no other country in which this valuable cereal is produced to any considerable extent. In many other of the cereals the United States holds a leading rank with the agricultural products of other countries of the world.

THE RESOURCES OF ILLINOIS.

To the wealth of the country the great State of Illinois, which I have the honor in part to represent, largely contributes. In 1879 Illinois produced 325,000,000 bushels of Indian corn, 51,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 63,000,000 bushels of oats. In all of these products that State produced more than any other State in the Union. In this connection I may be pardoned for reading a few extracts from the recent work on "The West," by Mr. Robert P. Porter, special agent of the tenth census, page 177. The facts stated by Mr. Porter are based upon the statistics obtained from the tenth census, (1880,) and the references to Illinois are principally from the reports of the State board of agriculture. Mr. Porter says:

The total values of the farm products of such a State as Illinois in a single year scale up into numbers that are really grand. According to the estimate of Secretary Fisher, of the State board of agriculture, the corn, wheat, oats, rye, and barley produced in 1880 reached a total of 373,649,888 bushels, worth $145,186,736; the hay and potatoes were valued at $26,278,039 more; the orchard products at $8,176,480; the horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs at $50,182,654, and the dairy products at $27,000,000. Adding $6,000,000 for poultry and eggs, $450,000 for honey and wax, and about $6,000,000 for the buckwheat, hemp, flax, broom-corn, tobacco, sorghum, grass seeds, beans, peas, roots, and other farm and garden produce, covering fully 500,000 acres, we have a grand total of more than $269,000,000, gold, as the value of the farm products of Illinois in 1880.

On page 178 Mr. Porter further says, in regard to the resources of Illinois:

But, great as is the magnitude of this State's agricultural interests, they are now rivaled by its manufactures and commerce. The rate at which these have developed has of late even outstripped the increase of its farm products. Geographically and geologically considered, the State is most favorably situated for the indefinite continuance of this rapid industrial and commercial growth. In addition to its inexhaustible coal beds and the abundant crude materials of its own forests, fields, and mines, it possesses unrivaled advantages in geographical position and natural and artificial means of transportation for obtaining the rich iron, copper, lead, and silver ores of Michigan, Missouri, and Colorado, and the forest products of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Indiana; it has the grain and other farm products to feed the workmen while they are manufacturing these materials, and it has the same means of transportation, together with the mercantile capital and combinations for distributing the manufactured goods.

No revelation of the census of 1880 will more strikingly impress the nation at large than the evidence of the westward migration of certain great industries, to which I give special consideration in another chapter. As shown there, Illinois has taken the lead in the manufacture of farm implements, in distilling, and in certain other lines of production, and is following close after the old-time leaders of the Eastern States, in rolled, wrought, and cast iron. She now stands next to Pennsylvania in the number and product of her Bessemer steel establishments. Of every 100,000 rails of all kinds manufactured in the United States in 1878, Pennsylvania made 46,026; Illinois, 22,226; Ohio, 9,915; Wisconsin, 3,274; Indiana, 3,274; Kansas, 1,437; Colorado, 181; while Missouri (standing nineteenth) made but 41, and Michigan (twenty-first) but 1.

In slaughtering and pork-packing her pre-eminence is beyond all comparison, the product of Chicago alone aggregating last year more than $81,000,000 in value. Men's clothing manufactured in Chicago exceeded $17,000,000, besides men's furnishing goods, hats, caps, and furs, boots and shoes, and millinery and ladies' wear, swelling the total to $30,000,000. Bridges, cars, and railway stock manufactured and repaired overran $8,000,000. Iron, rolled, cast, and wrought in the city, exceeded $15,600,000; the furniture, planing-mill, carriage, coopering, and other wood-working establishments, turned out products worth more than $21,000,000; while tanning and currying, and three other lines of factory work not hitherto named, each produced goods worth from five to six million dollars.

Mr. Porter then proceeds to point out in detail the many great industrial and agricultural interests in the State of Illinois.

Mr. Porter closes his chapter on Illinois with the following paragraph:

Nor can the people of Illinois rest until the union of the Mississippi and the great lakes is perfected at the wharves of Chicago. Even now a convention is called to adopt means to this end without delay. Considering that the State is now virtually out of debt; that the expenses of the State government are, for the most part, permanently provided for from this time forward out of its share of the earnings of the Illinois Central Railroad; that public buildings, bridges, roads, and other improvements of over $50,000,000 in value, have been constructed, and the local indebtedness incurred for the last of these has been largely reduced, while a constitutional provision interdicts excessive municipal debt-making in future; that, while the products of the field rapidly increased the products of the factories of Illinois more than doubled between the beginning of 1870 and the close of 1880; that the ratio of home capital in all kinds of enterprises was enormously augmented, while foreign capital poured in much more rapidly than ever before; that commerce outran all previous records by hundreds of millions; that all who seek employment here find it; and that all the potent forces described above are ceaselessly at work to extend and multiply the achievements and accumulations of the past—it would be presumption in any one to undertake to say what the history of Illinois for the next ten years may bring forth. It is impossible, however, to suppress expectation of a growth of grand proportions; a growth more remarkable, if possible, than anything in the past, however much like a magician's tale this would sound in any other age than ours, or in any other region than the West.

In view of these glowing yet truthful accounts of the resources, present and prospective, of the great State of Illinois, it is scarcely necessary for me to add anything further on the subject. But I may be permitted to say that the author has not overstated the facts. If those living amid the barren hills of Pennsylvania or struggling with the sterile soils of New England for a meager support would visit the State of Illinois and see for themselves the wonderful richness of her soil, experience the salubrity of her climate, and learn the vast and incomparable advantages of her location for the building up of great manufacturing industries, they would at once quit their present abodes and take up their habitation in the midst of this great empire of the West.

TARIFFS AND AGRICULTURE.

In view of the great resources and interests of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I may be pardoned for considering the effects of the present tariff laws upon agriculture. It is well known that our tariff laws furnish no protection whatever to agriculturists, notwithstanding the statement to the contrary by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] in his speech in this House on the 12th of April, and printed on page 6 of the RECORD of that day. That gentleman says:

> They talk about the farmer not being protected. Why, sir, he is protected in nearly everything he grows or raises, and protected just as much as he wants to be, just as much as he asks to be. He is protected in his horned cattle, in his hogs, in his sheep, in his bacon, in his hams, in his cheese, in his pork, in his corn, in his wheat, in his cotton, his tobacco, his sugar, and his wool.

I am surprised that such a statement should have been made by a gentleman who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

He then proceeds to specify the rates of duty imposed by the tariff law upon the various products of the farmer which he has mentioned. Hogs, horned cattle, &c., 10 per cent.; bacon and ham, two cents per pound, &c., throughout the list. This statement of the honorable gentleman is calculated to deceive, and does deceive all who are not better informed upon the subject than he is. He must have known that his statement which I have quoted was calculated to deceive. Except on the articles of sugar and wool, the products of the farm above mentioned are not protected by the operations of the tariff laws. It is true that the rates are levied in the law as he states, but he knows and the statistics show that the amount of such products imported into the country and the duties collected upon them are insignificant, and furnish no protection whatever to the producers thereof.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that the sugar interests of this country are protected by the tariff?

Mr. SPRINGER. By the terms of the law.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The sugar interests of the country are not protected by the law. The refiners of sugar get all the benefit.

Mr. SPRINGER. Two and a half cents a pound ought to furnish some protection to the producers of sugar. But the gentleman from Louisiana ought to know better than I do what the practical workings of the tariff on sugar are. I will not take issue with him.

I call the attention of the committee and that of the country to the reports of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics upon this subject.

Mr. Nimmo's report on imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States for the year ending June 30, 1881, page 11, shows the amount of duty collected upon the various articles imported into this country. From this table it will be seen that the whole amount of duty collected upon cattle was $76,000 for the year ending June 30, 1881; on hogs, $766; on horses, $100,000, and on sheep, $194,000, and on all other animals not specified, $7,000. The tariff on horses and sheep is no protection to the farmer, but, on the contrary, a burden upon him, the horses and sheep imported not coming here to compete in the markets with our own, but being generally imported by farmers and stock-raisers for their own use. There is a considerable importation of barley, owing to its being brought from Canada, to be used in the manufacture of beer; but even on this article less than a million and a half dollars of duty was collected for the year mentioned.

The duty collected on Indian corn was only $7,516.20, and on cornmeal, $71.93. On oats the duty collected was $6,500, and on oatmeal, $4,500. The duty collected on rye was $702; on wheat, $2,116, and wheat flour, $512. Imported bacon and hams paid a duty of $1,548, and imported beef a duty of $1,640; imported butter, a duty of $9,500, and cheese, $146,000. Imported pork paid a duty of $286, and so on throughout the list. Such are the duties collected on the products of the farm, and which the gentleman from Ohio paraded with such assurance. He knows perfectly well that no matter what the duty imposed by law should be upon agricultural products, except wool, sugar, and barley, such duties would not affect the outward movement or exports of the vast products of the farms of the country.

When a government like ours is in a condition to export each year agricultural products to the amount of $729,000,000, as was done in 1881, being 82 per cent. of the entire exports of the country, and when, at the same time, the amount of agricultural products imported into this country was so inconsiderable as scarcely to be worth mentioning, except upon sugar, wool, and barley, the items which I have indicated, what importance is to be placed upon tariffs purporting to protect our farmers from competition with the products of the farms of other countries? It is time all this talk about farmers being protected in their products ceased. There is no foundation whatever for the assertion, except the statute which proposed to collect duties upon products, which, we all know, do not come in as imports, but which in immense volume go out, forming the great part of our export interest.

The American farmer must sell his surplus products at prices fixed in Liverpool in competition with the products of the pauper labor of Europe. The price, not only of the surplus which is exported but that which is consumed at home, is fixed by the export price. The manufacturer of New England pays the Illinois farmer no more for his corn, breadstuffs, and provisions than do the manufacturers of England, of France, or of Canada. If the Canadian manufacturer were permitted to trade freely with the Illinois farmer he would pay him two yards of cloth for a bushel of wheat, while the manufacturer of Massachusetts or Rhode Island only pays him, under the operation of this protective tariff, one yard of the same quality of cloth for the same bushel of wheat.

In this way is the Illinois farmer protected. It will not satisfy the American farmer to tell him that the protective tariff will build up for him a home market; a home market will not answer all of his purposes. The farmers of the country can supply the home market, and do supply it, and, at the same time, send abroad $729,000,000 of their products, being 82 per cent. of all exports, furnishing business for ships upon the seas and funds in Europe with which to pay for the immense amount of products of other countries which annually flow into our ports.

TWO COINCIDENCES OF AGRICULTURAL PROSPERITY.

The great prosperity which farmers enjoyed during the past two or three years has been frequently referred to as an evidence of their flourishing condition under the operation of a protective tariff. In this debate statistics have been produced to show how prosperous the farmer was and how much he owed to a protective tariff which furnished him no protection whatever. The great prosperity which the farmers enjoyed during the past three or four years resulted from two coincidences which rarely happen at the same time to any branch of industry. A recent article in the Mercantile News, of New York, explains these two coincidences. They were, first, abundant crops with liberal surplus to sell, a strong foreign market resulting from scarcity abroad and enabling him to command high prices for all his products; and, secondly, there was a state of domestic trade at home which enabled him to produce his harvests at the least cost, buying cheaply not only the implements he requires but supplies of every kind necessary for the maintenance of his farm and the support of his family. The article referred to says:

> It may be thought that such a condition of circumstances as this requires so many fortunate accidents as to be simply impossible. It is in truth anomalous and exceptional, and has happened only once in the whole history of our nation; that one incident of its occurrence covering a period of several years from its inception to its termination, we have recently beheld; and it will be long, we fear, before we shall look upon its like again.

The article then proceeds to point out the range of prices which the farmer was enabled to realize upon his products beginning in 1875 and continuing to 1880. It shows that the prices were not extraordinarily high, yet taken in connection with the volume of the export trade and other circumstances, they were an index of enormous revenues. From the exhibits produced it was shown:

> First, as to the prices which the farmers of the United States received for their products during the year succeeding the panic; and secondly, as to the prices at which they were able to buy the articles required for their use by the enhancement on one side and the depression on the other, both of which were directly in their favor, they enjoyed an advantage equivalent to from 10 to 20 per cent. on the aggregate of their production. For a series of years, during which they were benefited no less by the deficient harvests in Europe than by the abundance of their own, they had the peculiar and enviable luxury of buying in a cheap and selling in a dear market.

The value of the total product of this country of cereal grains, potatoes, tobacco, hay, and cotton for the year 1875 is stated in this article at $1,740,000,000. For the year 1880 it is reported in round numbers for all classes of agricultural products at $2,500,000,000. The average annual production between these years is placed at $2,000,000,000 or $12,000,000,000 for the period of six years. The article says further:

> This was the genesis of the boom. In this phenomenal order of things it had its birth and grew in stature and potency until it lifted all the industrial, commercial, and monetary interests of the country out of the demoralized state into which they had fallen.

And, again:

Such were the fruits of a singular and fortunate convergence of influences which may not repeat itself in our history in the life-time of the youngest reader of this journal. That our commercial and industrial affairs should be so ordered that we can sell at high prices and buy at low, with an assured market for our surplus products, an active foreign and domestic trade, a transportation system of which no enlargement seems too great for the demand upon its capacity to supply the world, and gathering its wealth into our coffers, and thus realizing alike the fondest dream of the patriot and the wisest scheme of the political economist, is a strange and happy coincidence which we may be thankful to have witnessed, but of which we can scarcely hope for a renewal.

From these facts it will be seen that so far from protective tariffs having benefited the American farmer during the last four or five years, he has prospered in spite of the tariffs, and the agricultural productions, enhanced and made profitable by the coincidences which I have mentioned, not only enriched the farmer for the time but also lifted the manufacturing interests from the disasters which had come upon them, and which a protective tariff could not avert, and caused them to flourish and also gave life and vigor to all the other interests of the country. The agriculturists of the country, with their great and unparalleled products, relieved the distresses of the crisis which 1873 produced, lifted our distressed and protected manufacturing interests out of their embarrassments, and placed the whole country again upon the high road to prosperity. During these years, the farmer enjoyed precisely the conditions which commercial freedom offers to him, namely, an enlarged market in which to sell his products and a cheap market in which to buy the articles which he needs.

THE GERMAN PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

The example of Germany as one of the governments which has adopted the protective system has been frequently referred to in this debate. The first uniform tariff law passed by Germany was in October, 1870. It was amended in 1873 and superseded by the law of July 15, 1879—the law now in force—which law took effect January 1, 1880. The policy of Germany up to 1879 was virtually that of free trade. The acts of 1870 and 1873 placed such low duties on imported articles as scarcely to affect their prices. The law of 1879, which took effect January 1, 1880, is protective in its operation, and has changed radically the whole policy of Germany on this subject. But as the law was passed in the interest of certain powerful manufacturers, it avoided as far as possible tariffs on native products and raw materials.

Metals, (excepting iron,) raw skins, and hides; raw cotton, wool, and silk; coal, charcoal, and peat; pitch, tar, and animal oil, &c., are placed on the free list. Pig iron is taxed 1 mark per kilogram, or $2.37½ per ton; the duty on meats is $28.50 per ton; on preserved fruits, $142.50 per ton; on cheese, $56 per ton; on wheat and rye, $2.37½ per ton, and on flour $4.75 per ton; while the wearers of silk hats (stove-pipes) must pay $1,425 per ton, and the ladies who wear silk dresses must pay at the rate of $2,137.50 per ton for the luxury. Verily, the German law-makers have "sat down" on silk hats and silk dresses. The effect of these taxes upon provisions, breadstuffs, and other necessaries increased the price of living in Germany without any corresponding increase in wages. What has been the result in Germany? The friends of the measure have been disappointed at the unfavorable effects produced in that country.

Instead of increasing the wages of labor the protective tariff destroyed the demand for labor in many localities and largely increased the price of living. The reports of the German chambers of commerce for the year 1880 have been published, in which the effects of the tariff in many localities are pointed out. In Brandenburg the report is that the new law has been "absolutely ruinous to the local industry, which is cloth-making." I read from a summary of these reports published a few days ago in a New York paper: "At Sorau it is feared that the high duties on raw material will have an increasingly damaging effect on the linen manufacture, the chief industry of the place."

Insterburg, a frontier town of West Prussia, reports that the immediate effect of the new tariff has been to pauperize the population by destroying the trade across the border. Memel, Tilsit, and Königsburg make the same complaint, the latter in very bitter terms. As to the sea-port towns, Elbing reports that the wheat trade has been hurt, and no other branch of commerce is thriving; Stettin declares "the necessary result of the new regulations is a decline in trade;" and in Stratsund "the whole maritime population is suffering from continued and intensified depression."

The free cities of Hamburg and Bremen both speak in strong terms against the tariff; and in all Silesia only two little manufacturing towns are found to have a favorable opinion of the tariff. Breslau sees no good result from it, and Grünberg declares that "the only hope for trade lies in return to the customs policy of 1865, if only to relieve the pressure on the necessities of life."

All through Saxony the iron and machinery interest are "suffering under severe pressure." The reports from Altona and Bielefeld say that their industries find no increased home demand for their products, and they declare for "free trade with reciprocity." In Barmen and Elberfeld trade has "suffered severely," and Frankfort-on-the-Main makes a similarly unfavorable report. Zittau "has become convinced that the burden imposed by the new duties rest on German and not on foreign shoulders. In Stuttgart trade is as "stagnant as it has been for the last five years." Offenbach-on-the-Main says "the new tariff has pauperized the laboring classes," an evil which Mayence also deplores; while its chamber of commerce expresses the opinion that "the policy of abandoning the principles of free trade was based on an erroneous theory, and has not been attended with benefit to the general interests of the nation."

Such have been the effects of the establishment of a protective system in Germany. The already poorly paid laborer soon began to realize that the tariff which was enacted ostensibly to protect German labor was crushing out the laboring interests of the country. He found his income was inadequate to purchase the necessaries of life as heretofore. Increased cost of living without increased wages was just the same in effect as a reduction of the wages which were barely sufficient to support himself and family. Something must be done; starvation and want began to stare him in the face; his native country could no longer furnish him with the means of living, he turned his eyes toward America, and a stream of emigration set in to this country hitherto unparalleled in history. Behold the result. I produce herewith a statement prepared by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the number of emigrants arriving in this country from 1876 to the present time.

The following gives the number of immigrants arrived in the United States from Germany for each calendar year from 1876 to 1881, inclusive; also from January 1 to March 31, 1882:

1877	27,419
1879	43,531
1880	134,040
January 1 to March 31, 1882	36,589

From this it will be seen that the German emigrants arriving in this country during the year 1876 amounted to only 31,000; and for the year 1879, immediately preceding the taking effect of the tariff law, the German emigrants arriving in this country were only 43,531. The protective-tariff law took effect January 1, 1880, and during that calendar year the stream of immigration swelled from 43,000 in 1879 to 134,040. But the full force and effect of a tariff to protect German laborers had not yet been realized. During the year 1881 the tide of immigration was swelled to the enormous figure of 249,572, being an increase of over 600 per cent. of the immigration of the year 1879, before the law took effect.

The increased immigration from Germany in two years over and above the ordinary immigration from that country has been about 300,000, and the cry is "still they come." The laborers, in whose interest this tariff law of Germany it was claimed was enacted, are fleeing from its effects as from a pestilence. All civilized nations of the world have united in the severest condemnation of the Government of Russia for permitting persecutions upon the Hebrews of that country, persecutions which have caused a large increase of immigration from Russia to this country. But that immigration, caused by the religious fanaticism and persecution which is so severely and justly condemned by all the enlightened governments of the world, is as nothing compared with the exodus from Germany produced by the imposition of a protective tariff.

This German protective tariff drives more German laborers from that country than the persecution of the wicked Russians drives Hebrews from Russia. It is worse than war, pestilence, and famine. It is driving Germans from the homes of their fathers, from their native land, by hundreds of thousands to seek remuneration for their toil and means of living in a new world. But the German laborers, deprived of adequate wages at home, may flee to the virgin fields of America and thus better their future condition. But the American laborer who is now inadequately paid under our protective policy has no place else to go. He must strike for higher wages or strike against threatened reductions of his pay; he must then be locked out, and at last be starved into submission, and forced to deprive himself of the luxuries and many of the necessaries of life.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit a question here?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Was not the protective tariff to which the gentleman refers passed in 1879, in mid-summer, after a period of free trade which had prostrated all German industry, a tariff which is not yet thirty months old?

Mr. SPRINGER. The law took effect the 1st of January, 1880, and the number of immigrants arriving in the United States has gone on constantly increasing until it was last year 249,000, because of the operations of that tariff. It drove immense numbers of laborers from their native country to this country.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Two thousand landed yesterday at Castle Garden.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; as the gentleman from New York says, 2,000 landed at Castle Garden yesterday, and they will continue to come until Germany reverses this policy, or submits to the loss of a large and valuable part of her industrial population.

Mr. Chairman, I have prepared at considerable labor some statistics upon the subject of the TARIFF ON WOOL.

In 1867 the wool-growers of the country and the manufacturers of woolen goods succeeded in inducing Congress to impose protective duties on the importation of foreign wools, and also to impose such additional duties upon importations of foreign woolen goods as would compensate them for the loss they would sustain by reason of the duties on the raw material. The tariff upon wool prior to 1867 had been fluctuating under various acts of Congress from 1824 to 1865. Some of these acts place the duties very low. From 1858 to 1861 wool costing 20 cents per pound or less was on the free list, and all other wools paid a duty of 24 per cent. ad valorem. From 1862 to 1864 the duty on wools costing 18 cents per pound and less was but 5 per cent. ad valorem; and over 18 cents and less than 24 cents it was 3 cents per pound; and over 24 cents per pound in price, 9 cents per pound in duty.

Between 1865 and 1866, the tariff on wool costing 12 cents per pound and less was 3 cents per pound, and costing over 12 cents up to 24 cents per pound the duty was 6 cents per pound, and between 24 cents per pound and 32 cents per pound the duty was 10 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem; and on all wools costing over 32 cents per pound the duty was 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. The act of August 22, 1866, slightly changed these duties, but they remained substantially the same until the taking effect of the act of March 2, 1867, the law now in force. I will not recapitulate the various tariffs imposed by the act of 1867. The classification prepared for Government experts embraces one hundred and sixty-eight different standard samples of wool to be taxed under this law. The duties, however, vary from 18 to 110 per cent.

These burdens are very unequally distributed on the different classes of wool, carpet wools being taxed at the rate of from 18 to 39 per cent. ad valorem, while fine wool pays from 37 to 88 per cent. in the grease, and from 31 to 96 per cent. if washed, and from 73 to 110 per cent. if in scoured condition. It will be seen that the high tariff upon fine washed and scoured wools has had a marked effect upon the manufacture of woolen goods in this country, and has worked greatly to the injury of both the wool-growers and manufacturers, as will be seen as I proceed further.

The wool-growers felicitated themselves after the passage of the act of 1867 upon the success which had attended their efforts in securing a protective tariff on their product; but we will see how far their expectations have been realized. Their object in securing tariff legislation was to prevent foreign wools from competing with their products. They desired to practically exclude many classes of wool from our markets in order that they might receive greater prices for all they might raise. I shall be able to prove that, so far from realizing their expectations, the market has actually been depressed; that in the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers the number of sheep has vastly decreased, and that the price of wool has averaged less per pound since the high tariffs were imposed than prevailed previously under low tariffs.

The American wool-growers are not the only persons who have been disappointed in this respect, and our Government is not the only government that has imposed protective duties on wool at the instance of wool-growers to realize later that the object had in view was not only not accomplished but the opposite of public expectation occurred. The history of protective tariffs on wool in this country and in France and England shows how wrong in theory is the idea that tariffs of themselves control prices. Tariffs may contribute to raise or to lower, as other circumstances may contribute to produce results, but they are not the sole cause of high prices or low prices. It has frequently happened in the history of our country, and in the history of other countries, that protectionists have secured high tariffs on particular articles only to realize low prices at home for articles intended to be protected; while, on the other hand, free-traders hoping to secure low prices by taking off duties have been disappointed to find the prices higher after than before. I have the authority of Mr. Bastiat (Sophisms of Protection, page 211) for the following information in reference to protective tariffs on wool in France and in England:

Says Mr. Bastiat—

> For instance, in France, to protect the farmers, a law was passed imposing a duty of 22 per cent. upon imported wools, and the result has been that native wools have sold for much lower prices than before the passage of the law. In England a law in behalf of the consumers was passed exempting foreign wools from duty, and the consequence has been that native wools have sold higher than ever before.

History has repeated itself in the United States on this subject; and this leads us to consider how prices are affected by tariffs. The reason a protective tariff may result in diminishing the price of the home product is from the fact that while the supply may have diminished by cutting off the foreign importation of the raw material the embarrassment to manufacturers resulting from this may have caused a diminished demand; and if the demand should diminish in greater proportion than the supply should diminish the price would fall instead of increase. On this subject I may be permitted to quote again from Mr. Bastiat. He says:

> 1. Prices rise either on account of augmented demand or diminished supply.
> 2. They fall by reason of an augmentation of the supply or diminution of the demand.

There are two kinds of dearness and two kinds of cheapness. There is a bad dearness, which results from diminution of supply, for it implies scarcity and privation. There is a good dearness, that which results from an increase of demand, for this indicates the augmentation of general wealth.

There is also a good cheapness, resulting from abundance, and there is a baleful cheapness, such as results from the cessation of demand or the inability of consumers to purchase.—Sophisms, page 214.

Applying these general principles to the facts in relation to the wool interest of the United States the complications concerning the subject will be easily understood.

I have stated that since the passage of the protective tariff act of 1867 up to the present time, a period of fifteen years, the price of wool in this country has been less than it was for the fifteen years next preceding that time. This proposition is not left to conjecture or speculation. Fortunately for the position which I assume, the most accurate and reliable data upon this subject have been preserved, and herewith I present for careful examination the following statement furnished by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department.

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR.,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
February 3, 1882.

The average price for the fifteen years preceding 1867 was 52.8 cents per pound.

The average price for the fifteen years succeeding 1867 was 48.6 cents per pound.

From these figures I have prepared an average for the fifteen years preceding 1867, and find that the average price of wool during those years was 52.8 cents per pound, and for the succeeding fifteen years the average was only 48.6 cents per pound, showing a loss to the wool-grower of 4.2 cents per pound on every pound of wool grown from 1867 to 1881, a period of fifteen years. This is no small loss to the American wool-grower when we consider the value of the product of the wool in this country. I have before me a table published in the speech of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] which will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 12, on page 10, showing the quantities of wool produced, exported, and retained for consumption in the United States from 1861 to 1881, inclusive.

From this table it will be seen that the whole amount of wool produced from 1867 to 1881 was 2,796,750,000 pounds, upon every pound of which the wool-grower has averaged a loss of 4.2 cents per pound. The average production for each year, according to this statement, would amount to 186,450,000 pounds, and the average annual loss would amount to $7,830,900, while the grand aggregate of fifteen years' loss to wool-growers by reason of a protective tariff, which was secured by their own efforts to better their condition, amounts to the immense sum of $117,463,500. But the injury was not confined to the loss on the price of wool produced. There has been a corresponding loss, and even greater loss, in all the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers on the number of sheep owned by the wool-growers, and also there has been great depression almost continually since 1867 among the wool-manufacturers themselves, who then hoped to profit by this unholy alliance with the wool-growers for the bettering of their mutual interests.

I present herewith a statement of the number of sheep in the principal sheep-growing States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers at stated periods between 1866 and 1880, the last column of figures having been taken from the census of 1880. This statement has been prepared from reliable statistics, and to it I call the special attention of the advocates of protective tariffs on wool:

From this statement it will be seen that the total number of sheep in the States of Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New York, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa in 1867 was nearly 30,000,000. On March 2 of that year the present tariff law took effect. The number of sheep in the States named began to fall off as if visited by a pestilence. In 1869 the number was 26,000,000; in 1877 the number was less than 15,000,000; in 1878 less than 13,000,000; in 1879 13,500,000; and in 1880 only 14,500,000—being less than one-half of the number of sheep in the States named when the protective tariff on wool took effect. In this connection let me call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to the effect produced upon his own State.

In 1867 there were 2,399,000 sheep in Iowa. The tariff law of that year struck the flocks of that State like a northern blizzard. At any rate the number of sheep has fallen off until, by the census of 1880, but 455,000 sheep remained to tell the story of the wrongs they have endured by reason of a protective tariff on wool. The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] in the closing remarks of his speech upon this bill, grew eloquent in extolling the beauties of protective tariffs. He showed what great results they had accomplished, and pointed out how his ear had been charmed with "the hum of the spindle, the sharp ring of the anvil, the whistle of the plane, the crash of the great roller upon masses of iron and steel;" but he failed to state the effect of a protective tariff upon the sheep of the State which he has the honor in part to represent. His partiality for manufacturing interests and disregard of sheep husbandry remind me of the shepherd boy in the comic opera of Mascotte, wherein he sang: "You more than sheep I love;" and he might have added in his beautiful peroration that the music of the manufacturers' machinery was more fascinating to him than the plaintive "baa" of Iowa sheep, groaning under the burdens of a protective tariff.

It is true that there has been a large increase in the number of sheep grown in the States west of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. This is owing to the fact that Texas and California and other Western States and Territories have been found well adapted to the raising of sheep; but if you take the whole United States in 1867 you will find the number of sheep then in existence in the United States to have been 42,000,000. (See Agricultural Report for 1871, page 39.)

Between 1867 and the census of 1870 there was a decrease in the number of sheep in the whole country amounting to over 13,500,000. It is important to keep this fact in mind in comparing the census of 1870 with that of 1880. The whole number of sheep in the United States according to the census of 1870 was 28,477,951. In 1880 the whole number of sheep in the United States was 42,381,000, as will appear from the following letter from Mr. Seaton, Superintendent of Census, and the accompanying table. This letter, it will be seen, is addressed to the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] to whom I am indebted for many of the statistics which I have submitted upon the subject of the tariff on wool:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1882.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 6th instant, I have the honor to hand you herewith a table compiled from the agricultural schedules of the census of 1880, showing by States the number of sheep on farms on June 1, 1880. This does not include the "spring lambs," but is in fact the number of animals on farms from which fleeces were taken at the spring shearing of 1880. To obtain the total number of sheep in the country at date of the census it is necessary to add to these figures the number of sheep characterized as "ranch stock;" that is, the sheep on public or unoccupied lands, the enumeration of which could not well be made by the regular enumerators in the ordinary farm-to-farm method.

The statistics in regard to these animals have been gathered by a special agent, whose final report is not so far advanced as to enable me to give definite results. For the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, Texas, and Idaho Territory the compilation is complete, and the number to be added as ranch stock for those States is 5,439,733, and it is probable that New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Montana, Colorado, and other grazing sections will show an additional increase above the numbers on farms of at least 1,750,000.

Making these additions, we have the following:

Enumerated on farms	35,191,656
Ranch sheep, (in five States)	5,439,733
Ranch sheep in other States and Territories, (estimated)	1,750,000
Total sheep at date of census	42,381,389

The delay, which I greatly regret, in replying to your letter has been due to the endeavor to render the estimate in regard to the numbers upon ranches as complete as possible.

Very respectfully,

C. W. SEATON,
Superintendent of Census.

Hon. ABRAM S. HEWITT, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

* Ranch clip, fall clip of 1879, and "pulled wool" not included

It will be seen from these statistics that after fifteen years of protective tariffs on wool the number of sheep in the country is practically the same as it was when the law of 1867 was passed. While the population of the country has increased over 30 per cent. and railroads have penetrated all the Western States and Territories and immense agricultural interests have grown up everywhere, the number of sheep has not perceptibly increased. Contrast these facts with the sheep interests in Great Britain. I have the authority of the executive committee of the American Woolens and Wool Association for the statement that the whole number of sheep in Great Britain in 1866 was 25,795,000, in 1874 it was 35,000,000, an increase in eight years of 35 per cent. under absolute free trade in wool, and with an area no greater than some of our larger States.

I desire to explain as clearly as I am able to do the remarkable results following the passage of the protective tariff on wool in 1867. I know that protectionists are slow to believe facts so unwelcome to them as those which I have presented, but facts are facts and must be accepted as true. These facts are consistent with all other facts which have taken place since the passage of the act of 1867. I have stated that prices are sometimes affected by other causes than by the imposition of customs duties to protect the home product; but in the case of the tariff on wool passed in 1867, which instead of increasing the price of the home product diminished it, the explanation is found in connection with other facts to which I will call attention. As I said before, prices may be enhanced by diminishing the supply, and prices may be reduced by limiting the demand; in other words, prices are controlled by the inexorable law of demand and supply. In the case of wool the tariff produced a greater effect in diminishing the demand than it did in diminishing the supply, and hence there was a falling in price. I have already referred to the table printed in the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY.]

I refer again to that table. It will be seen that for the first year after the tariff of 1867 went into effect there was an increase in the native product of 8,000,000 pounds of wool and there was a decrease in the amount required for home consumption to the extent of 54,000,000 pounds. Here was not only an increased production of wool immediately following the passage of the tariff act, but there was a decreased demand, and the decrease of demand and the increase of the home supply had a double and disastrous effect in depressing prices. The amount required for home consumption fluctuated from 1867 to 1875, but did not equal the demand in 1866 up to that time in any year, except for the year 1872. There was also a fluctuation in the production of wool between 1866 and 1874, but the average was not increased greatly until after the effects of the panic of 1873, namely, in 1877 and thereafter.

The amount of wool imported immediately fell off between 1866 and 1867 from 76,000,000 pounds to 16,000,000 pounds, and it was not until 1872 that the imports exceeded the imports of 1866. For 1872 the imports were 122,000,000 pounds, but a decline gradually followed up to 1879 when the imports were only 39,000,000. The imports for 1881 were but 55,000,000, being 21,000,000 less than the imports of wool in 1866. And our exports of wool, which in 1866 amounted to nearly a million pounds, and even in 1862 exceeded a million pounds, have dwindled down to 71,000 pounds in 1881. Such is the condition of the woolen interest of the United States.

I have said that the manufacturers of wool have not been benefited by the present tariff law. In 1874 a committee of the New York Wool Trade made a report to the committee of the Chamber of Commerce of New York on the revision of the tariff, in which it was stated "that our woolen interest is depressed and suffering and that in reality it has never reached that degree of stability and security which would be commensurate with its magnitude and importance; that the amount of capital invested in it and that the indomitable energy which has so far preserved it from serious decline are facts too well-known to require any proof at our hands." This report then proceeds to explain some of the difficulties which beset the wool interests of this country. It says:

Our manufacturers are prone to rush into the production of such classes of goods as a momentary demand has rendered profitable, and the invariable result is an overproduction of those fabrics. Such an overproduction sometimes happens to manufacturers in Europe, but they can relieve themselves of their surplus stock at a comparatively small sacrifice by consigning their goods to foreign markets, where their cheapness has already introduced them. Our manufacturer, having made his goods out of highly taxed wool, has no such outlet for them, and is compelled to await the slow operation of time or submit to a heavy sacrifice by forcing his surplus on the home market in competition with his similarly situated neighbors.

This argument applies with equal force to all other manufacturing interests. But I quote further from the same report:

Before we enter upon an examination of the effects of our tariff on the wool-growing interest it will be well to consider that neither our country nor any country in the world does or can produce to advantage wools of all kinds and grades. It must further be borne in mind that in order to produce the endless variety of woolen fabrics demanded by our times, with the highly improved machinery now in use, and with the active competition among all manufacturing nations, the free and unrestricted selection of the most suitable classes and grades of wool has grown to be a matter of much more importance to the manufacturer of every country than it used to be in old times. Nor will it be denied that but few of our mills can at this day be run to advantage without using to some extent wools of such working quality as cannot be produced in this country, or are not produced here in sufficient quantity. The simple fact that even under our present tariff we have annually imported from fifteen to sixty million pounds of fine wool sufficiently proves these positions. The question of duty on fine wool can therefore never be a simple question of protection or no protection to the wool-grower.

The report points out wherein the tariff of 1867 failed to accomplish the object for which it was established, as follows:

These facts show most conclusively that the object ostensibly aimed at by the tariff of 1867, namely, the protection and encouragement of the wool-growers, has most signally failed. The wool-grower must be blind, indeed, if by this time he has not learned the lesson that he cannot prosper as long as the woolen interest does not flourish; why should he not also understand that our industry cannot permanently flourish until it is relieved of the present heavy burden of obstructive tariff legislation? By helping the manufacturer he would certainly help himself, and secure a better reward for his labor and investment than he could ever expect to derive from the illusive protection of any tariff.

Facts, indeed, as well as sound reasoning, call loudly for the abolition of all duties on wool. In the light of past experience it is clear that neither the wool-grower nor any other special interest ought to plead any injury as likely to result in our country from a policy that has had the most encouraging effect in all other parts of the civilized world. No perfectly safe and solid ground will be reached until wool takes its permanent place on the free list, and this must be the goal of the manufacturer as well as of the wool-grower—in fact, of the whole people.

The foregoing report was published in 1874. In 1878 the leading manufacturers of woolen goods in the United States united in a petition to Congress in favor of a revision of the tariff on woolen goods, in which they requested that the duties on all wools may be largely reduced, if not wholly removed; that wools not produced in this country be put on the free list, and that the duties on woolens may be fixed at a moderate rate, corresponding with the scale adopted in other manufactures.

They represented to Congress in their petition that for several years past their industry had "suffered great and general depression;" also that "many failures have occurred, many mills have stopped, and many others continue to run without adequate remuneration to their owners." They say:

We believe that one great cause for this widespread depression is to be found in the present high rates of duty on wool.

And again:

High cost of our fabrics has limited consumption and entirely prevented exportation, while low-cost foreign goods have forced their way into our markets through both legitimate and illegitimate channels.

After pointing out the facts that the shrinkage of values since 1867 had impaired the ability of consumers to pay the high prices contemplated by the tariff; that the number of those who can afford to purchase at a given price is lessened; that the wool-growers had not realized the advantages from the act of 1867 which they expected; that the depressed condition of woolen industry had given the wool-growers a poor market; that the production of fine wools has absolutely declined; that manufacturers of woolen goods must be left free to select their raw materials with reference to the goods they wish to make, the petitioners conclude by expressing their "deliberate conviction, after ten years' experiment, that the tariff of 1867 has not promoted the interests of the wool-manufacturers, has not promoted the interests of the wool-growers, and has been a great burden upon all the consuming classes, in return for which it has yielded no adequate revenue to the Government."

This petition is dated at Boston, January 17, 1878, and is signed by over 100 of the leading woolen-manufacturing establishments in the United States.

What more could be said against any tariff law than the leading manufacturers of the country have said in this petition. When the manufacturers, for whose benefit the high tariffs have been enacted, learn from sad experience that their coveted protection has ceased to protect, the great mass of consumers and tax-payers may hope and confidently expect relief.

The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] recently addressed a letter to one of the leading woolen manufacturers of the country, and requested his opinion as to the rate of duty which might be imposed on woolen goods. He has kindly permitted me to make use of the answer which he obtained. I am not permitted to use the writer's name, but I can assure the committee that his opinions deserve highest consideration, and he can be called before the tariff commission or the Committee on Ways and Means of this House if desired. He says:

If duties on wool were taken off, it is my opinion that manufacturers could submit to a lower duty than the Government could afford to levy. If a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem were put on woolens and the duty on wool taken off entirely, I think manufacturers and wool-growers would both be better off. I think that rate would compensate for any disadvantage which the American manufacturer would be under. I say the wool-grower would also be better off, for we should soon export certain kinds of wool, and he could direct his attention to those kinds which brought the highest prices.

This gentleman concludes his letter by saying:

Some branches of the woolen business paid no profit the past year. The margin is a small one. It requires all the appliances of skill, care, and economy, combined with taste and ability, to produce desirable styles to make the business pay. As a whole, I do not think the business can be described as extremely prosperous, and the ideas of those who consider that the tariff is piling money into the pockets of wool manufacturers are entirely erroneous. What the tariff puts on at one end it cuts off at the other. This is conclusively shown by the fact that while we are overproducing some goods to the point of loss, large quantities of other woolen goods are imported, and the prospect of profit from making them is so small that no manufacturer can be found to put his machinery on them.

This is the testimony of one of the largest and most experienced woolen manufacturers in the country. "What the tariff puts on at one end it cuts off at the other." Then who is benefited by the tariff except it be levied for revenue only, and submitted to as a necessary demand for the support of the Government?

I have given this extended examination of the wool interest from the fact that the magnitude of the interests involved demand immediate and intelligent consideration. I have also had in view the illustration of an important fact, namely, that what a tariff on raw materials and manufactured products puts on at one end it cuts off at the other; or, in other words, that such protection does not protect.

There is another fact which I desire to impress upon the committee, namely, that whenever any manufacturing industry has reached that magnitude that it is capable of producing more than the home demand it can only flourish thereafter upon such conditions as will enable it to produce at prices which will commend its products to the markets of the world. The great advantage of the present posit on of the agriculturists of the country is in the fact that, not having enjoyed any protection upon their products, (except wool, sugar, and barley,) they are enabled to sell their surplus in foreign markets, and thus they furnish over 80 per cent. of the exports of the country. If their products were burdened with local taxes, so as to increase the price above the demand for export, they would be exactly in the position which the woolen and many other manufacturers are now in—namely, burdened with overproduction, but shut out from foreign markets.

HOW TARIFFS AFFECT PRICES.

There has been much said during this debate concerning the effect on prices produced by reason of protective tariffs. The honorable gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] in his speech, advanced the doctrine that an "enlarged market inevitably advances prices." In other words, that free trade, which implies an enlarged market, will increase the prices of manufactured articles, and that protection will in the end reduce prices. This doctrine has been maintained, I believe, by all the gentlemen on the other side of the House. The honorable gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] showed how the price of salt has been reduced by protection. He published a table of facts and figures to prove it.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] presented the figures to show how the price of Bessemer steel had been reduced under the operation of a protective policy, and how the price of silk had also been reduced, and how the prices of blankets, woolen goods, cotton goods, nails, &c., had been reduced. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ERRETT,] a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, in his speech on the 29th of March last, said: "High duties on steel, it will thus be seen, instead of increasing the price has reduced it." Another member of that committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] argued long and ably to prove the same proposition. It may, therefore, be taken as an accepted doctrine among protectionists that protective tariffs reduce the price of the manufactured articles. Let us consider this proposition for a moment.

It must be conceded that the lower the selling price of a manufactured article, the less must have been paid for the labor which produced it, and the less must be the profits of the manufacturer. Protectionists assure us that protective tariffs will reduce prices, hence they must necessarily reduce wages and profits. It is only necessary that the manufacturers and laborers of the country should be convinced of the truth of this doctrine and of the truth of the further proposition that free trade increases prices, and they will at once become free-traders. I am not going to stop to deny these propositions, but am willing protectionists should have the full benefit of their own teachings. In fact there may be some truth in the statement. I am quite certain that the protective tariff of 1867 did reduce the price of wool, as I have already shown.

There is a further fact that I gather from the census of 1870 and that of 1880 in reference to the wages of labor. The wages paid in 1870 in the manufacture of iron and steel averaged $522.40 to each hand. In 1880 the average wages in the same industry was only $393.51, showing a loss of $128.89 a year to each laborer, or about 25 per cent. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] says: "Taking the year 1880 against 1868, the fall in price [of Bessemer steel] has been from $158.50 to $67.50 [per ton] under the operation of this protective 'robbery' involved in your tariff." Of course, the manufacturer cannot pay as high wages in 1880, when he must sell his steel at $67.50 per ton, as he did in 1868, when he sold at $158.50 per ton. He stated also that the price in February last fell to $55. In view of these facts wages must come down still lower, or production must cease for a time, and hands must work on reduced time.

Is this the boasted "protection to American labor" which the advocates of high tariff propose to secure? After fifteen or twenty years of protective and prohibitory tariffs the advocates of the system inform the country that it was intended to produce low prices, and consequently low wages and small profits. They have introduced elaborate tables of figures to prove the reduction of prices under the operation of protective tariffs. It is easier to agree with your adversary than to disagree. In this instance the protectionists make so strong a case that I would rather agree with them than to disagree and give my reasons. For the purposes of this debate, desiring to remove as many disputed points as possible, I will agree to all they claim. Something has produced reduced prices in many articles.

Protectionists say "the protective tariff did it." Then I charge the advocates of this protective tariff from their own stand-point with a conspiracy against American laborers, with advocating a policy which, in the end, will reduce the prices of home productions, the wages of labor, and will reduce our labor to the level of the pauper labor of Europe, if not below it. The greater success attends their efforts to reduce prices of manufactured articles, the greater will be the reduction of the wages of labor engaged in such manufactures. Perhaps the significant words "in the end" are about to be realized.

I am in receipt of a letter from one of the largest iron and steel manufacturers of the country. He writes me as follows:

> Just now the rail business, and in fact all our business which depends upon the railroad demand, is very much depressed. There is next to no demand at all. In consequence our rail mill is idle and so are our steel works, and we have not orders enough to keep our bar-mill going on half time. Very near all our men have been laid off and the prospect is very uncertain.

This is not an isolated case. The same condition of things prevails from Boston to Chicago. But the high tariff is still in force, and has been for twenty years, and it is not threatened with an immediate change. The passage of this bill to create a commission to investigate the question of the tariff is certainly no menace to the business interests of the country. What, then, is the cause of the present depression and the many strikes which are occurring in all parts of the country? Certainly free trade, or a tariff for revenue only, has had nothing to do in bringing about the present situation. The tariffs are as high as the friends of protection desire to make them. And yet there are signs of distress.

I would do nothing to increase the danger or depression. I would avert it if in my power. Cannot this Congress, before we adjourn this session, do something to avert the threatened distress? I have not the honor to be a member of the Committee on Ways and Means; but I have patiently waited for that committee to bring forward a measure of relief. But my waiting has been in vain. In the mean time the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has brought forward a proposition, which, it seems to me, has much to commend it to this House and to the country. We must deal with things as we find them. His proposition, in short, is the placing of raw materials, as far as possible, on the free list, and that no higher rate of duty shall be imposed than shall be necessary to compensate for the difference in the cost of the labor at home and abroad.

He is one of the largest manufacturers in the country, and we may presume that he will not advocate a measure which would injuriously affect the business interests of the country. I am willing to accept his proposition as a compromise, as a step in the right direction. It has received the commendation of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, of the independent press, of large mass-meetings, of political organizations, and of thousands of business men and manufacturers all over the country. As forcibly expressed by another, his proposition is "radical in principle, but conservative in methods," and "that radical truths conservatively applied cause all peaceful progress."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Permit me to say in this connection that I hold in my hand a petition signed by eight hundred of the leading business firms of the city of New York, praying this House to adopt the resolution which I have proposed to offer, namely:

First. The repeal of the duties on raw material.

Second. The proportionate reduction of the duties on articles manufactured from the raw material thus placed on the free list.

Third. No duties exceeding 50 per cent., except those on luxuries.

The gentlemen who sign this petition are men who rarely sign their names to petitions; and I may be permitted to say that I have seldom, if ever, held in my hand a document which embodied more weight, intelligence, and influence than this which I shall propose to offer in open House at a future time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thank the gentleman for this confirmation of my statement, that his proposition had received the indorsement of the leading business men of the country.

THE ISSUE BEFORE THE COUNTRY.

Mr. Chairman, the real issue presented to the country in this debate has been greatly misunderstood or willfully misstated. It is not between free trade and protection. I know of no party in this country or in this House who proposes free trade as a remedy for existing tariff abuses. The issue is not one between the advocates of free trade and the advocates of protection. On the contrary, the issue is between those who desire an immediate revision of the tariff and the reduction of its excessive and prohibitory duties, and especially the removal of those burdens which are causing factories, mills, and workshops to be closed for the want of a market for their products, and depriving thousands of laborers all over the country of employment, producing strikes, lockouts, and low wages; and those who desire to postpone tariff revision indefinitely and thus preserve existing taxes, fearing a change might result in depriving a few favored interests of the advantages they now have.

In short the issue is clearly between those who desire to bring immediate relief to the country through revision and reduction of duties and those who desire postponement and the present unequal and oppressive system. The opponents of this tariff-commission bill are in favor of immediate revision and a large reduction of many of the existing duties such as I have already indicated.

MUST NOT DISTURB BUSINESS INTERESTS.

I concede to the fullest extent the necessity of so adjusting the tariff as not to disturb the business of the country or oppress or embarrass any of our great industries. Such policy does not imply a departure from correct principles. The whole business interests of the country and the prices of nearly everything that we consume are affected more or less by the present protective tariff laws. To suddenly disturb these prices by violent change of our system might produce distress, if not financial calamity, such as we have not witnessed hitherto in the history of the country. The needed changes must be brought about in the most careful and considerate manner. This can be done so as to produce, as each change takes effect, increased vigor in manufactures, renewed confidence to the capital of the country, and increased wages to labor.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Chairman, it should be our highest aim as legislators to adopt such measures as will protect the people in the enjoyment of all the great blessings of freedom which our fathers secured to us by their sacrifices and their blood. Our statutes should be so framed as to guarantee to every citizen, rich or poor, native or foreign born, the greatest personal liberty consistent with good order and the well-being of society.

Let all have freedom to think, to speak, to write, to print, and to vote. Freedom to worship God, or not, according to the dictates of conscience. Freedom to buy and to sell, and freedom to come and go at pleasure throughout the land—

Land where our fathers died!
Land of the Pilgrims' pride!
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring!

* In the column of "Production" the amount placed opposite the fiscal year is the production of the preceding calendar year. †Quantity cannot be stated.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I anticipate it will be somewhat of a surprise when I announce that I propose to discuss the bill before the committee. I remember Mr. Webster began one of his incomparable speeches in this wise:

When the mariner has been tossed for many days, in thick weather and an unknown sea, he naturally avails himself of the first pause in the storm, the earliest glance of the sun, to take his latitude and ascertain how far the elements have driven him from his true course.

Would it not be prudent for us, sir, after these many days of unrestrained debate upon the tariff question, during which every sea of fact and speculation has been explored, to return to the harbor whence we departed, and before further venture determine at least the purpose of the voyage and the direction of our course?

A stranger, listening to this discussion, and ignorant of the provisions of the bill before the committee, would assuredly have fallen into the error of supposing that some proposition was being considered which, if formulated into law, would change our entire tariff code, or so materially modify it as to amount to a substantial revision. The course of the debate would certainly have justified such conclusion. Recurring, however, to the express terms of the measure which has provoked this agitation, the delusion is instantly dispelled and the astounding fact revealed that there is nothing, absolutely nothing, in the bill before us, from its opening to its closing section, which, by any possible construction, can be tortured into a modification of one single provision of our present tariff code. Crystallize its language into law and stop there, and you have left untouched and unchanged every syllable of our revenue statutes.

Why, sir, you yourself, Mr. Chairman, in the beginning of this debate, when it was sought to give to this bill some advantage over other measures on the Calendar under that rule of the House which awards precedence of consideration to bills for raising revenue, held, and in my judgment most correctly, that it was not in any sense a revenue bill; from which opinion no member of this House had sufficient courage to appeal. The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] whose knowledge of parliamentary law is second to none in this body, ably supported and fully approved the judgment of the Chair, and yet he, who usually hews sharply to the line in debate, yielded the judgment of the logician for the tactics of the partisan, and led off on the Democratic side of the Chamber in a general crusade against our tariff system, in utter disregard of the real issue involved.

And so the debate has continued with few exceptions from the beginning, covering not only the entire range of the tariff but our whole system of internal taxation, exhausting the experience of men and the philosophy of the schools, (and well-nigh the patience of the House and the country,) leaving untouched and unconsidered only the bill of the Senate. And so this measure, simple, yet comprehensive, conceived in the highest wisdom, approved by the Senate and commended by the public judgment, has been dragged through the slough of a political debate, for political purposes, in utter disregard of the great interests of the country it was intended to subserve.

The incongruities which have, in some instances, grown up under our present tariff, which no foresight could avoid, conceded by all and defended by none, to correct which this very measure is formulated, are with partisan avidity seized upon and held up to public derision, for the purpose, not of furthering any judicious measure of relief, but rather to inflame the public mind and, if possible, shake its confidence in the governmental wisdom and capacity of the Republican party. Nay, more; to so far deceive the people as to instil into their minds, if possible, the belief that Democratic ascendency is a necessary prerequisite to revenue reform.

Such, sir, has been the scope and purpose of this debate. Now, for myself, however inviting the field over which others have traveled, whatever trophies might be won, I am content to discuss the bill before the committee, postponing whatever I may have to say upon the tariff until such time as the commission proposed by this bill, if it shall become a law, shall make its final report and the Ways and Means Committee have formulated a bill which in direct terms proposes a change in our tariff code.

Let us recur, then, to the terms of the Senate bill, consider its scope, and mark its exact boundaries. The first and second sections contemplate and provide for the creation of a commission, to be known as a "tariff commission," consisting of nine persons taken from civil life and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The duties of this commission are prescribed by the third section of the bill in the following terms:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, upon a scale of justice to all interests; and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it, said commission, in the prosecution of its inquiries, is empowered to visit such different portions and sections of the country as it may deem advisable.

The remaining section of the bill imposes upon the commission the duty of causing the testimony taken by it to be printed, from time to time, and distributed to Senators and Representatives, and that its final report, together with the evidence taken, shall be made to Congress by the 4th of December next.

This is the entire range of the bill. The field for legitimate debate, therefore, is circumscribed within very narrow limits. But two questions are involved. First, the necessity for a revision of the tariff; and, secondly, the propriety of creating the proposed commission as an auxiliary to such revision. That is all there is of this question.

Upon the first proposition, to wit, the necessity for a revision of the tariff, there seems to be no contrariety of opinion. All parties, men of every shade of belief, from the high protectionist to the extreme free-trader, all unite in demanding a readjustment of the present tariff. We are relieved, therefore, from discussing the first proposition, being one upon which we are all in substantial accord. The necessity or propriety of a revision is not denied.

Upon the second branch of the controversy, namely, the wisdom of creating the proposed commission as an auxiliary to tariff revision, entire harmony of opinion does not prevail. Here is the issue, and the only issue. It becomes necessary, therefore, to enter somewhat into detail touching the reasons to be advanced in support of this commission and to reply briefly to some of the objections urged against it.

Two methods for revision are open to us. The one proposed in this bill is to employ the services of nine men, men of affairs, from civil life, of ripe experience, mature judgment, divorced as far as possible from the considerations of party policy and advantage, looking only to the highest advancement of the Republic, conversant with our manifold and complicated industries, who shall devote themselves to the investigation of all questions touching the diversified interests of the people, so far as is necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff or a wise revision of the old, and report the result of such examination to Congress as a preliminary step to entering upon the onerous and delicate task of revision; in other words, to employ this means to become possessed—not the Ways and Means Committee alone, but every member of Congress—of all the information obtainable upon this subject, so that when we enter upon the work of revision we do it understandingly, comprehending the effect of every modification, however far-reaching it may be in its consequences. That is the plan of the majority.

The other course insisted upon by the minority is for the Ways and Means Committee to bring in at once a tariff bill of some character, sufficient to open the door for amendments, and then trust to the House in the heat of debate and on the threshold of a political campaign to amend, modify, and patch up, as will best subserve the political advancement of each individual member, some measure, and thus attempt the perfecting of a work which requires for its successful accomplishment the most considerate judgment and unselfish patriotism. This is the other proposition.

I submit, in choosing between these two methods there ought not to be the slightest hesitation. For myself, I am for the commission, and it seems to me the reasons to be urged in its support are most cogent and unanswerable. In the first place, it will be conceded that anything like hasty or inconsiderate legislation touching the tariff would be extremely hazardous. The interests involved are so vast and multifarious, the tariff laws touching these interests so complicated and far-reaching, that the slightest disturbance in any particular is felt throughout the entire system. A distinguished author has expressed this thought in such apt and forcible phrase that I venture its reproduction:

If you have ever seen—

when a spider touches a thread of his web how the whole net-work will tremble, you have an illustration of the manner in which all the fibers of all the different kinds of industry carried on in this country are interwoven together, so that a shock given to one part is transmitted to another and runs through the whole texture. If the price of flour is raised the cost of bread is increased, and with it the cost of living, and with that the cost of labor, and hence the cost of all the results of labor. Whatever, then, affects the price of flour will therefore extend its influence over almost all branches of industry. Proceed by a similar process to trace out the connection of any art or species of industry, as of printing, iron manufactures, and those of lead, copper, wool, cotton, hemp, leather, and if you have not gone through the same process before you will be astonished to find with how many others it is directly or remotely connected, on how many others it depends, and how many others depend upon it.

Mr. Chairman, this is not an overdrawn statement. Indeed it would be difficult, if not quite impossible, to magnify this phase of the subject. The connection between our various industries is so intimate and delicate that the slightest disturbance in any part is quickly felt throughout the entire body. It is believed that if a single planet should grow unsteady or waver in its allotted course all nature would feel the shock and give instant sign of approaching chaos. As well expect the universe to be insensible to the loss of a world and move on in undisturbed harmony as to hope for a readjustment of these great laws of trade without affecting the entire range of our immense industries. If it be true, therefore, that a modification of our tariff laws, however trifling, involves consequences so momentous, is it not of the highest importance that whatever change be made shall be after the fullest examination and most considerate judgment?

The practical question then is, whether the proposed commission would be a valuable help to Congress in formulating and perfecting a wise tariff code. If it would, then it should be authorized; if not, all thought of it should be at once abandoned and the work of revision immediately entered upon. Now, I grant that the proposed commission is wholly unnecessary if every member of this House, or a majority thereof, can honestly say that they are in possession of the requisite information to enable them to act intelligently upon every phase of the tariff question—if there is no modification to be suggested the consequences of which they could not readily comprehend, and point out with unerring precision, the exact extent to which it would affect the manufacturing interests of the country. Who is bold enough to arrogate to himself such knowledge?

I believe, therefore, in the first place, that the proposed commission would be a valuable help to the Committee on Ways and Means. Certainly it is not derogatory to the high character of that committee to say that this commission would at least be able to collect a mass of material which would be of incalculable value in framing a wise tariff measure. Instead of imposing this labor upon the Committee on Ways and Means we employ this commission. This commission would stand in the place of, and be substituted for the Committee on Ways and Means, from the hour of its appointment until the opening of the next session of this Congress, in so far as the examination of witnesses and the hearing of arguments is concerned, and the results of its labors would be as valuable to the committee as though performed by itself. Practically this is but continuing the work of the Committee on Ways and Means, during the recess of Congress, so far as it relates to the tariff question. What possible objection can there be to that.

Again, no Committee on Ways and Means of this or any House can perfect a wise tariff measure without some such assistance. It will not, I am sure, be regarded as in any sense a reflection upon the committee, under the leadership of its distinguished chairman, to assert that it is impossible for that committee, during a single session of Congress, to properly discharge the necessary duties imposed upon it and at the same time give to the preparation of a tariff bill in all its details that consideration which its importance demands. Such an achievement is beyond the reach of human capacity. The proposed commission, however, prosecuting its investigation throughout the summer and autumn would so relieve and supplement the labors of the committee that we could have presented to us at the next session of Congress a measure so happily conceived and of such seemly proportions as to command the regard of Congress and the country.

But I favor this measure chiefly because of its advantage to the members of this body. It is provided by the bill that the commission shall cause to be published from time to time and distributed to the members of Congress the results of its investigation, and the consequence will be that the mind of the legislator will be specially directed to this subject during the months of the recess. The question of the tariff will more or less enter into his thought and speech during the approaching campaign, and from necessity his fund of information will be largely augmented, and he will be better prepared to enter upon the work of intelligent revision.

While it is not anticipated that the labors of this commission will convert a "free-trader" into a protectionist, or a protectionist into an advocate of a "tariff for revenue only," yet the direct tendency will be to produce a harmony of views from the height of statesmanship touching the details of a tariff bill. It is just here that I am constrained to believe the services of this commission will be most valuable. Grant, if you please, that the Committee on Ways and Means is now fully prepared to report a wise and comprehensive measure of reform. Yet, does not experience teach that it will be impossible to forecast the fate of such a measure when once launched upon the turbulent and uncertain sea of partisan debate? It is well understood that the moment such a bill is introduced, however judiciously framed, it will be the signal for opening the flood-gates, through which would pour a torrent of amendments, beneath which it would be hopelessly submerged, or if rescued, rescued only to be interred.

Gentlemen representing every section of the country, with its diversified and sometimes seemingly conflicting interests, might be tempted to lose sight of the general good, and, under the pressure of the demands of their immediate constituency, influenced by the hope of personal advancement, lend their support to measures that might needlessly prostrate a growing industry or imperil the public weal. It is to avoid this danger more than aught else that I would invoke the services and secure the helpful guidance of the proposed commission.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. How does the gentleman propose to exempt the bill that may be prepared by the commission from all the difficulties he has so ably recited?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. From the difficulties of amendment?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. From the difficulties of amendment, discussion, &c.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. It will not be entirely relieved from those difficulties. But if the gentleman has followed the thread of my argument——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have been trying to do so.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. He will observe I am only contending that we shall be better prepared, when possessed of the information to be derived through this commission, to consider and vote upon amendments than we could possibly be if called upon to act upon amendments, on the instant, and without such information.

While the arguments in support of this commission might be multiplied almost indefinitely, yet I will trespass no further upon the indulgence of the committee than to supplement what I have said in support of this measure by the opinions of some of the foremost Democrats of the country. The opposition to this measure comes from the Democratic side of the Chamber. It may have escaped the attention of the public, yet it will not be surprising to know that but recently the Democratic party, if the opinions of its leading men are to be regarded, was as heartily in favor of this commission as it is now strenuously opposed to it. It is one of the peculiarities of modern Democracy that the principles it avowed yesterday it repudiates to-day. The cause it espouses to-day it will abandon to-morrow. Indeed it may well be questioned whether as a party it has any fixed and abiding convictions. Its history for the last twenty-five years is a history of vacillation, insincerity, and folly.

In 1872 it demanded a speedy return to specie payments; in 1876 it denounced the resumption act and demanded its repeal. In 1868 it demanded the payment of the interest-bearing obligations of the Government in irredeemable paper; in 1872 it denounced repudiation in every form and guise. In 1868 it demanded the abolition of all instrumentalities designed to secure negro supremacy; in 1872 it recognizes the equality of all men before the law, of whatever race or color. From 1860 to 1865 it wielded its party power to obstruct the successful prosecution of the war for the Union; in 1882 it proclaims itself the chief instrument in accomplishing its successful results. In 1868 it publicly thanked Andrew Johnson for exercising the veto power in resisting the aggressions of Congress; in 1880 it declares that the use of the veto power insults the people and imperils their institutions. In 1860 it drove labor to the shambles and sold it at public auction; in 1880 it declares itself the friend of the laboring-men. In 1868 it is for a Democrat for President; in 1872 it enlists under the banner of a Republican. In war it follows the leadership of a peace general; in peace it supports a general who was for war. One of your own number, the distinguished gentleman from Texas, [Mr. UPSON,] has fitly characterized the course of the Democratic party as follows:

It can succeed, he says—

If the Democratic party will be true to its time-honored principles, true to itself, shake off its spell of vacillation and lethargy, cease its cowardly trimming at every doubting whisper, quit dodging at every flitting shadow, stop tweedling every political crank, and drag itself from the meshes of that drag-net policy, thrown out to catch the followers of every new-fangled ism and popular whim.

And so the Democratic party for a quarter of a century, without chart or compass, has been cruising in every sea, intent upon and anxious only to avail itself of any breeze from any quarter that might fill its sails and carry it into political power. I thank God that I belong to a party that in storm or sunshine has kept steadily on its course. [Applause.]

Upon this question of the commission scarcely two years have gone by since the leaders of the Democratic party were its open and avowed champions. We have only to turn back the pages of history to 1880 to find the strongest Democratic sanction of this measure both in act and speech. It will be remembered that this bill was conceived by a Democratic Senator, Senator Eaton, of Connecticut, brought forth in a Democratic Senate, and christened in a Democratic committee. In the Forty-sixth Congress, and on the 17th day of September, 1879, it was introduced into the Senate and referred to a committee. On the 13th April, 1880, it was reported back to the Senate with a favorable recommendation by that distinguished Democrat from Delaware, Senator BAYARD, taken up for consideration on the 27th May, 1880, and on the 3d of June, 1880, passed the Senate by a vote of 31 yeas to 14 nays. Of the thirty-one Senators voting in the affirmative sixteen were Democrats, and their names are as follows:

Senators Bailey, Bayard, Brown, Butler, Eaton, Groome, Hampton, Hill of Georgia, Kernan, McPherson, Morgan, Pendleton, Ransom, Slater, Vest, and Withers.

Of these sixteen Senators voting for this bill, permit me to quote the language of some of the most distinguished, which will suffice, I trust, to demonstrate the wisdom of this commission and refute some of the frivolous objections I have heard urged against it upon the floor of this House.

Senator GARLAND, of Arkansas, then chairman of the Committee on Territories, speaking of this commission and the wisdom of it—this commission which gentlemen now say is abrogating our constitutional functions and impeaching our capacity—says:

Just about two years ago, struck with the importance of an inquiry of this character, I introduced in the Senate the bill that I now have in my hand, to raise a commission upon the subject of the tariff, to examine into that matter in all its length and breadth, and all of its details, and to report to Congress the result of that examination and inquiry, with such suggestions as that commission might see proper to make, with the view that Congress could with more propriety, upon the information thus furnished, legislate upon this among the most important subjects of legislation before the country.

For myself I do not hesitate, nor did I when I introduced the bill, to admit that I am in a woful condition of ignorance upon this subject of the tariff.

We heard upon the floor of the other House, we heard upon this floor, gentlemen who had been in these Houses during the war, and before the war, and had this subject in hand, disputing absolutely as to some of the most minute and some of the simplest things in reference to the tariff system of the United States.

Impressed then, Mr. President, as I was proceeding to say, with the lack of sufficient information upon this subject to legislate properly upon it, I proposed this measure, being unwilling myself to embark upon a sea of legislation with the very limited information and the very few lights that I had before me. Indeed on any of these great subjects that affect every section of the country in all the ramifications of their different interests, the theory of commissions to get up the necessary information and report to Congress must necessarily be a favorite, as in the instance of the silver commission.

We all agree that some tariff system suitable to the interests of the country and properly adjusted to them should be adopted at the earliest possible time. I believe no one with whom I have conversed on this subject pretends that he understands the tariff system as it now exists in the United States, and to read the different speeches that have been made in the Senate explanatory of it, in my humble judgment, according to my experience, only makes "confusion worse confounded."

I desire now to read from the speech of Senator BAYARD, of Delaware, who was at that time chairman of the Committee on Finance, and certainly his opinions are entitled to consideration. Senator BAYARD says:

In my judgment it is better that this whole commission should come from civil life and not be connected with Congress. In the first place, what we want is widespread knowledge, representing every view of taxation, representing every great interest of the country which is the source of taxation, that men should be chosen for this purpose who have made political economy, the gathering and arrangement of statistics, and the philosophy of trade and commerce the special study of their lives. It is proper in this commission that the great interests of the cotton-growing States, of the sugar-growing States, of the wheat and grain-growing States, the tobacco interest; in other words, that the great agricultural interests of the country, its manufacturing interests, its mining interests, all should have their intelligent representative upon this board of nine men, in order that the plan submitted by them shall be truly an explanation and a grouping of the facts essential for a proper understanding and execution of the great task which Congress is to undertake.

But further: our opinions, our thoughts, our studies will all be given I trust in the measure of our capacity to a proper solution of this question, and what we ask and what we need is light from other quarters brought to us, and which we can obtain only through the employment, under the authority of law, of individuals who have made these subjects their peculiar study.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is that from the speech of Senator GARLAND?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. It is from the speech of Senator BAYARD. He says further:

Since I have been a member of this body, now well-nigh twelve years, I have been assigned to duty upon the committee to whom this subject of revenue in its various shapes has been submitted. The question of tariff duties, the question of excise duties, has therefore become in some degree familiar to my mind. It has been a constant subject of my thought; it has been a constant subject of my examination, and far and wide, as far as my opportunities have permitted, I have endeavored to gather knowledge upon the subject and to apply proper principles and the great principles of government to make that knowledge useful, and I feel to-day that we need in Congress the independent counsel of educated men.

Now, sir, on this subject we are not committing ourselves blindfolded to the decree of this unknown body of experts, but we are by this measure taking the step needed to give ourselves that information, derived from a source entitled to our respect, which will command our confidence, and which we do think will be a basis of a proper scheme of legislation. The more independent such a commission is of Congress and of party and of section, the better and the more valuable will be its counsels. I for one want them. I can learn from my associates in this Chamber their views; I can obtain them by my private intercourse, and I can gather them from them in debate; but I have not the advantage of learning from these nine other men occupied each in his own pursuit unless we shall call them into public service and obtain from them the knowledge which they are so competent to give.

Senator KERNAN, of New York, then chairman of the Committee on Patents, also gave his views on the subject in the following language:

Mr. President, I am in favor of the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and report to Congress.

* * * * * * *

I recognize the fact that to establish a system of imposts which shall approximate to fairness and justice toward all classes and all industries and give the requisite revenue requires great familiarity with economic laws and with the practical business workings of the country. I do not think that Congress should act upon the subject without the aid of men who have made this subject a study, men who have made political economy and the subject of taxation by imposts a study, based as their information is upon the careful gathering together and examining of statistics. I do not think we can wisely act upon the subject without the benefits of this information, these figures, and the views of men who have made this subject a study, as well as of practical men engaged in the business industries of the country. I wish to express my opinion very strongly that it is wise to have this commission appointed, and that it should be appointed now, or at least there should be provision made by law for appointing it now.

Senator MCPHERSON, then chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, spoke very strongly in support of this commission. In the course of his remarks he said:

I am willing the tariff shall be revised; I am willing to have a tariff to secure a sufficient revenue for the country, and I want an intelligent commission who will present to the Congress of the United States such a tariff. While I have as much confidence perhaps in the integrity and ability of the individual members of the Senate as any other Senator on the floor, I do aver that there is no member of the Senate as competent to deal with this great question as a man who has given a whole life-time of study to it. I do not underrate the intelligence of the Senate. When the report is made to you, you will have it to consider; you will have the whole question brought before you, and if you can present a better system of revision than that presented by the commission, you can do so. I will join the honorable Senator in any revision that will seem proper and necessary. But the idea that a committee of this Congress can in the very short time allotted to them secure a revision of the tariff that will commend itself to the gentlemen of the Senate and to the whole people, is to my mind positively absurd.

Senator EATON, of Connecticut, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, advocated the bill at length. I quote the following from his remarks:

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the question of the tariff. This is not the object, as I understand it, of the bill which I had the honor to introduce.

* * * * * * *

I want nine intelligent men to examine this question with great thoroughness and make their reports to Congress so that Congress may act intelligently.

* * * * * * *

I drew the pending bill without consultation with a single man in the world save one friend in Connecticut.

* * * * * * *

I may be mistaken, but I believe that there is not a Senator on this floor who can give his time to this question. That is the first thing. Can my distinguished friend from Delaware, the head of this committee, give six months' time, a year's time, to this work? No. Can my friend from Georgia? No. Can my friend from South Carolina? No. Can my friend from Missouri? No; not one man of you can do it. It is impossible. One would suppose, to hear my distinguished friend from Texas, that all that was needed was a little jaunt, to go to Saratoga or Long Branch or somewhere else and eat dinners, and that would be all. That does not help to discriminate between all the great interests of the country. It relates to consumption, as my friend from Delaware suggests. The gentlemen who have this matter in charge have got to take up and examine four thousand different articles; have got to see what enters into the manufacture of every great thing in this country.

* * * * * * *

Another argument which has been used is that Congress should not debar itself from its power. Mr. President, I do not understand the force of that argument. Congress will not debar itself from any power. We seek information; we seek it as the French Chambers seek it; we seek it as the British Parliament seek it. Again and again, on great, overshadowing questions that have been brought before the British Parliament, they have sent to an outside commission to report to Parliament.

Senator HILL, of Georgia, then chairman of the Committee on Expenses of the Senate, said, in the course of his speech:

No members of Congress can take up this subject and master it themselves. They have to go outside to get information. Why do they go outside to get information? Because there are others who have devoted more attention to the subject than they have. There are men outside who are experts in the various branches of industry. They have made it the business of their lives and they know all about it. So I do not think the fact of calling in outsiders to give Congress information is at all improper or unusual or unsafe.

We are not appointing a commission to enact a law. If this was a proposition to appoint a commission of nine gentlemen outside to enact a law which they could report to the President and the President approve, I would appreciate the force of the objection made by the Senator from Florida. But we are simply adopting this as a method of getting information for the action of Congress. Congress reserves absolute control of the whole matter. Congress can use this information in its legislation as it pleases. It is the only power that can use it, as my friend from Delaware says. Why on earth there should be an objection to a system of this kind to get information to enable Congress to act the more intelligently and more efficiently I confess I cannot see for my life. If it shall be so that the President shall appoint a commission who are incapable to do this work, of course we are not bound to confirm them. It would be a mistake, and it would be a mistake on our part as well as the President's, for I presume the Senate will not confirm men unless it is satisfied that they are competent to do this work; and when we get this information then Congress may take the information and enact a law.

We get information every day. Do we not use the works of all great writers on every subject that comes before us? Are we not every day using the works of Story and Cooley and the works of many others on the great constitutional questions, availing ourselves of the information they give us? I do not see any impropriety in it.

Such is the forcible language used by leading Democratic Senators in advocacy of this commission.

But if there is nothing in all this of sufficient weight to command the respectful consideration of the Democratic portion of this Chamber and induce you to desist from your opposition to this measure I am quite certain that you will not turn a deaf ear to the voice of that illustrious soldier who, as the chosen leader of your party in 1880, guided you so gallantly to defeat. Your latest candidate for the Presidency is committed to this bill, and if there is any one subject upon which that gentleman has convictions more pronounced than another it is the tariff question. [Laughter.]

It will be remembered that the exigencies of the Democratic campaign for 1880 made it necessary that General Hancock should make some kind of a demonstration upon the tariff question. [Laughter.] The field of his exploit was Paterson, New Jersey, and his achievement was so brilliant that it not only startled the denizens of that peaceful hamlet but filled the whole Democratic party with consternation and dismay. Before the shattered forces of the Democracy could recover from the blow a friend of the General's, and one of the sufferers from the raid, solicited an explanation of what seemed to him to be an unpardonable blunder. I have before me the letter and the reply. Permit their reproduction:

MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY, October 11, 1880.

MY DEAR GENERAL: My attention is called to-day to an interview, or a reported interview, had with you by a person representing the Paterson Guardian, of this State. As I read the report it seems to me you were very imperfectly understood or very indifferently reported. I come to this conclusion because of my knowledge of your views upon the tariff question. The report does you injustice. The subject is one which our manufacturing friends are very solicitous about and very properly so. I regret that your views upon the tariff question, as I understand them to be, had not found fuller expression in your letter of acceptance. If the misrepresentations of your tariff views continue would it not be wise and just to take some occasion to put yourself right?

Very truly, yours,

THEO. F. RANDOLPH.

Gen. W. S. HANCOCK, Governor's Island.

General Hancock replied as follows:

GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, NEW YORK, October 12, 1880.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I have received your favor of the 11th instant. In my letter of acceptance I expressed my full sympathy with our American industries. I thought I spoke plainly enough to satisfy our Jersey friends regarding my tariff views. I am too sound an American to advocate any departure from the general features of a policy that has been largely instrumental in building up our industries——

Mr. HORR. Why, is it possible that he could have said that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan:

and keeping Americans from the competition of the under-paid labor of Europe.

If we intend to remain honest and pay the public debt, as good people of all parties do, and if we mean to administer the functions of government, then we must raise revenue in some way or other.

With a reunited and harmonious country we shall certainly in time pay off the public debt; but the necessity of raising money for the administration of the Government will continue as long as human nature lasts. All parties agree that the best way for us to raise revenue is largely by the tariff. So far as we are concerned, therefore, all talk about free trade is folly. But the tariff question—

Now, mark you; I desire specially to call the attention of my Democratic friends to this—

But the tariff question will probably be treated with justice to all our interests and people by some such bill as Eaton's.

The tariff-commission bill. This was in October, 1880, while you were supporting him for President.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It was a different bill from this.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Only in including the internal-revenue clause; and not one of the speeches of the Democratic Senators from which I have read referred to internal taxation as a reason for creating the commission. And General Hancock is only speaking of the tariff. He continues:

I believe that a commission of intelligent experts—

Let me repeat—

I believe that a commission of intelligent experts, representing both the Government and American industries, will suggest tariff measures that will relieve us of any crudities and inconsistencies existing in our present laws, and confirm to us a system which will be judicious, just, harmonious, and incidentally protective as well as stable in its effect.

I am, truly yours,

WINFIELD S. HANCOCK.

THEO. RANDOLPH, Morristown, New Jersey.

And thus we have, in support of this measure, superadded to the indorsement of the most trusted lieutenants of the Democracy, the open approval of its late distinguished leader. May I ask, if eighteen months ago the commission was so wise and prudent, what has since transpired to convert it into a measure of iniquity and folly?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. You emasculated the bill by leaving out all that relates to the internal revenue.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I have answered you upon that point already.

Certainly no reason can be assigned for this entire change of front but that weightiest of all reasons with the Democracy, the hope of temporary political advantage. For the commission in 1880, against it in 1882. When in power it served your party purposes better to favor it; now you think it to your advantage to prevent the commission; prevent the majority from taking, if possible, the only practical step toward revision of the tariff, and then parade its acknowledged incongruities and inequalities as a reason why the Republican party should be overthrown. Is not that your party policy this year, shortsighted and inconsistent as it is?

And here I close what I desire to say touching this commission; and here the debate upon this bill might have ended. The gentleman from Iowa, however, [Mr. KASSON,] in opening the discussion, thought it wise to go beyond the strict requirements of the occasion and enter upon a general consideration of the tariff question; and others upon both sides of the Chamber have followed that lead. Now, if I felt at liberty, or able to divine the motives of the gentleman in charge of this bill in thus going beyond the limits of legitimate debate, I should say it was for the express purpose of drawing from the Democratic party a fresh avowal of its views upon the general question of protection and free trade, that the country might be apprised of the opinions held by that party in 1882. I suspect that was the object. If such was the purpose of the gentleman from Iowa, he has been eminently successful.

The people of this country to-day of all classes are much more interested in knowing how the two leading parties stand upon the great questions of protection and free trade than they are about the details of any tariff measure. As between these two policies the public judgment is made up. The party of free trade in this country will go to the wall. Therefore it is that I am extremely gratified that the gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber have not only had the opportunity to meet and answer the sophistries of free trade but have been able to draw from the Democratic party a fresh avowal of its views upon this great national question. Such a declaration will be of service in the approaching campaign. It was needed for 1882, for while the conviction is growing in the public mind that the Democratic party is drifting toward free trade, or that equally dangerous and barren shore, a "tariff for revenue only," it might be possible for the party to escape such judgment if it was left at liberty to refer only to its uncertain and ever-changing record. By its record it could prove anything, protection, free trade, or utter indifference to the subject altogether. Its course upon this great economic question is utterly amazing and sufficient to destroy public confidence in the sincerity of its convictions and awaken widespread alarm in business circles at the faintest suggestion of its return to power.

Glance for a moment at its vacillating and disgraceful record upon this question for the last quarter of a century. In national convention, in 1856, it makes this resolve:

The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of * * * progressive free trade throughout the world, by solemn manifestations to place their moral influence at the side of their successful example. (Resolve 1.)

[Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. What was the verdict of the people on that platform?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I am speaking of your record, not of results.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That is the question the people decided.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. In 1860 the Democratic party broke in twain, and the Douglas wing of the party declared "that Democratic principles are unchangeable in their nature when applied to the same subject-matter," and reaffirmed the platform of 1856. The Breckinridge wing of the Democracy resolved as follows:

The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of * * * progressive free trade throughout the world, by solemn manifestations to place their moral influence at the side of their successful example. (Resolve 1.)

That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of any other, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country. (Plank 4.)

I have not been able to find, for some reason, any declaration of the Southern Democracy on the tariff question in 1864. [Laughter.] And the Northern Democracy, in the spirit of economy, declined to make any suggestions about revenue for the support of the Government in 1864, of whose continued existence they then entertained the gravest apprehensions. We have this, however, to console us, that "Democratic principles are unchangeable in their nature when applied to the same subject-matter." In 1868 the Democracy are in favor of incidental protection to American industries, and declare in national convention as follows:

A tariff for revenue upon foreign imports, and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country. (Plank 6.)

Here we have protection to American industries one of the cardinal principles of Democracy; yet "Democratic principles are unchangeable in their nature when applied to the same subject-matter." [Laughter.]

In 1872 the Democratic party nominated the most pronounced and ultra protectionist in the whole country, and for the Morrill tariff, then in full blast, denounced now as "legalized robbery," they had no word of censure, and the whole question of the tariff ceased to be a matter of national concern, and was committed to the several Congressional districts as has been suggested, to "go as you please."

Listen to the third plank of their platform in 1872:

Recognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade, we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their Congressional districts, and to the decision of the Congress thereon, wholly free from Executive interference or dictation.

[Laughter.]

What a record for a great party! This will be a good time for the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to inquire about the "verdict of the people" that year; yet "Democratic principles are unchangeable in their nature when applied to the same subject-matter."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Oh yes; the object was to spike Greeley's gun, and we did it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Tell us about the verdict in 1876.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. In 1876 they demand that all custom-house taxation shall be "only for revenue," and in 1880 a tariff "for revenue only." So for twenty-five years the party, as a party, upon this question as well as upon others, has been "all things to all men," that it might gain some votes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I cannot; my time is nearly out.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. When did your party advocate protection in its national platform?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has not the floor.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I hope the gentleman will not be impatient.

Now, if this is not sufficient to demonstrate the utter lack on the part of the Democratic party of any abiding convictions upon the tariff question, and to prove that it is ready to adopt any policy which will serve its immediate political ends, it will only be necessary to quote the declarations of its last Presidential candidate.

General Hancock again expressed himself on the tariff question. Now it is an overshadowing issue. Eighteen months ago it was not of so much consequence. General Hancock was interviewed by the editor of a Paterson, New Jersey, newspaper, and this question was addressed to him:

There is one thing, General, I desire to speak about. The tariff question is creating a good deal of talk in Paterson, particularly among the manufacturers and working classes. Now, how is that going to work?

Here is General Hancock's reply:

That question cannot affect the manufacturing interests of the country in the least.

My election could make no difference either one way or the other. There has to be a certain amount—millions of dollars—raised by a tariff that can be got in no other way, and that must necessarily give protection to the manufacturing interests of the country. The election of a Democratic President or the election of a Republican President cannot interfere with or influence that in the least. The Paterson people need have no anxiety whatever that I will ever favor anything that interferes with the manufacturing or industrial interests of the country. They will have just as much protection under a Democratic administration as under a Republican administration.

The tariff question is a local question.

[Laughter.]

The same question was brought up once in my native place in Pennsylvania.

[Laughter.]

It is a matter that the General Government seldom cares to interfere with, and nothing is likely ever to be done that will interfere with the industries of the country.

So much for the public declarations of the Democratic party only eighteen months ago. Then the tariff question was only a matter of local gossip in an obscure town among the mountains of Pennsylvania. Now it has assumed national proportions, and, in the judgment of the Democracy, become the overshadowing issue of the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I would like the indulgence of the committee for, say, ten minutes more.

Several MEMBERS. Let the time be extended.

Mr. RUSSELL. Owing to the desire of the House to dispose of this bill, and in view of the large number who still desire to speak, I feel obliged to object.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman from Michigan will indicate how much time he wants, I will cheerfully yield it to him out of my time.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Not to exceed ten minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I am greatly obliged to the gentleman from Kentucky for his courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed for another ten minutes.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. But what is the opinion of the Democratic party to-day, in 1882, upon the great question underlying the revenue system? Is it in favor of protection or free trade, or that twin folly, a tariff for revenue only? For answer I will take the open avowal of those gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber who are presumed to reflect the sentiment of their party.

Mr. AIKEN, of South Carolina, says:

I must ask permission of the gentleman from Iowa for time to make a correction in what he has said. He is evidently placing my colleagues in a false light, and as one or two of them are absent from the House at this time, I wish to say they are opposed to protection, but at the same time they know, as sensible men, we must have revenue to carry on the Government, and that that revenue must be collected by duties on imports. They are in favor, of course, of raising revenue to defray the expenses of the Government by duties on imports, but anything else in the shape of protection does not meet with anything like encouragement from me or from my colleagues.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, says:

Under the present necessities of the Government absolute free trade is impracticable. If we did not owe two thousand millions of dollars, if we had no pension roll, I should be found among those who fight under the flag of an unrestricted commerce.

Mr. MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, says:

But what I do insist is that we ought to so adjust our tariff laws as to raise the greatest amount of money with the least discrimination.

Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky, says:

I am one of those who believe that the power of taxation can be legitimately employed only for public purposes, or, in other words, that the object of all taxation should be revenue, revenue only, if you please.

I say that the duty and the power of the Government extend only so far as to impose a tax for the purpose of raising revenue for public purposes. But I hold at the same time that no tax or duty can be possibly imposed without affecting to a greater or less extent some or all of the industries of the country; and for my part I would rather help them than hurt them.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, says:

The Democrats, when they planted themselves upon a tariff for revenue only, declared through their leading men and by every authority whose utterances are worth considering that their only intention was to remove the obstructions to the growth of industry by making raw materials free.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, says:

He knows that a large majority of the Democratic party of this House stand upon the Democratic platform of a revenue tariff opposed to a protective tariff.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, says:

Why not have as near free trade as practicable, to wit, a tariff for revenue?

Mr. DUNN, of Arkansas, says:

Where revenue ceases robbery begins, under the operations of our tariff system. Protection as a principle is not only without constitutional warrant or authority but it is also unwise, unsound, unjust, and ruinous as an economic national policy.

Mr. ARMFIELD, of North Carolina, says:

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that free trade is the summum bonum of all commercial law; that it ought to be hoped for and prayed for by every patriot and philanthropist, as the millenium is hoped for and prayed for by Christians.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, says:

The fact that we have a large public debt upon us and an immense pension roll which must be promptly met in good faith, renders absolute free trade impracticable. For these reasons there is no Democrat on this floor who now advocates absolute free trade. "A tariff for revenue only," as stated in the Democratic national platform, is the only tariff you can lay without departing from the Constitution and perpetrating a species of robbery under the forms of law.

Mr. MOULTON, of Illinois, says:

What reason is there why the people should not buy where they can purchase the cheapest, and sell where they can get the best price for the productions of their labor?

The protected class say that unless Government protects us by a tariff and thereby enables us to charge a higher price for our goods we cannot go on and must close our business. Foreign competition must be shut out or we die. Suppose this is true. Upon what principle of justice has the iron, steel, cotton, or woolen manufacturers the right to compel the citizens of the whole country to pay them a gratuity, bonus, or premium to enable them to do business and make enormous profits at the expense of the people?

Mr. MULDROW, of Mississippi, says:

Sir, the principle of protection for the sake of protection is wrong.

Mr. SIMONTON, of Tennessee, says:

I, for one, cannot understand how it is a reproach to us who oppose the doctrine of protection as applied in our fiscal system, that the deductions of profound inquirers, seeking only the ascertainment of truth or the weight of authority among the ablest writers on political economy, or the great body of professors in our institutions of learning, should concur in our views. I welcome such reproach as this.

Although these citations might be multiplied, yet these are sufficient to show the current of thought and opinion entertained by the Democratic party in 1882 upon the tariff question. It is a matter of congratulation that the Democratic party has at last come to anchor upon this subject and raised the banner of free trade. It is to be hoped that you will not strike your colors before the engagement ensues.

This year the party is for a tariff for revenue only, adverse to protection, with its tendencies all in the direction of free trade. This is the issue you have sought—this the issue you have made up, and upon it we go to the people and await their verdict with the utmost confidence and composure. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, in what I shall have to say at the end of this long and tedious debate I shall endeavor to avoid the example of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] who has just preceded me, in making a political speech to this House under cover of discussing a bill relating to the revenues of the Government; but I shall endeavor to confine myself as closely as may be to the discussion of the pending measure and the general question of the tariff, a revision of which it at least proposes to provide for.

The gentleman from Michigan has wandered through the political history of this country for several decades in order to demonstrate to this House that the Democratic party has no convictions, and is without a party record upon this or any other question. He has charged amid the merriment of his side that that organization has been constantly in the market seeking to make dicker and trade with all the fag-ends of American politics. If he had been as fair as I mean to try to be, he would at least have supplemented his indictment by the admission that if she had been so persistently engaged in these efforts she had met with but poor success. If you will take the votes of that very respectable but numerically small independent organization that is represented upon this floor, they furnish no evidence of barter, or trade, or league with the Democracy.

But whatever sins that party may have committed in that direction, and I doubt not that she is amenable to criticism, for no party is perfect, no party is absolutely pure, there is one consolation which every Democrat recalls with constant and abiding satisfaction. That is that there is one political degradation to which the Democratic party has never yet sunk. She never did go into league with the fag-ends of a Commonwealth's politics, without regard to antecedents or history, gathering up the confederate and the Union elements, black spirits and gray, and making a conglomeration like Hecate's hell-broth of "tongue of dog and toe of frog," and supplementing it with the dishonest repudiators of honest debts in order to gain ascendency in a Federal Congress. She never, by an open alliance with repudiation, befouled the untarnished escutcheon of a proud old Commonwealth upon which during a century had been traced the story of a nation's glory. [Applause on the Democratic side.] She never held power in either House of the Federal Congress as the inevitable product of such a foul and unnatural coalition. [Continued applause.]

I am not going to discuss politics; I mean to discuss this bill. I mean to comment upon the action of the committee that dares to bring it here and fling it into the face of this House. But it is impossible to enter into a discussion of this bill without treating to some extent the general tariff system of this country, for which the advocates of this measure pretend that it is meant to provide a revision, but which some of us believe it is simply intended to perpetuate. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States has any power to levy a duty for protection. I confess that under the eighth section of the first article of the Federal Constitution Congress is empowered to lay taxes by way of impost duties for the raising of a revenue. But I assert that a tariff for revenue is a tax, and I assert that a tariff for protection is pillage and robbery.

There is no judicial dicta to be found emanating from any court upon this continent that warrants the levying of a tariff tax for the purpose of protection. A tax is described and declared and defined to be the imposition of an exaction laid upon the property of the citizen for the support of the State. Taxation is an attribute of sovereignty; it is the grandest of all sovereign powers. The highest judicial tribunal of the land has declared it to be the power to destroy. I deny that under the provision of this Federal Constitution Congress holds any power to levy any tax for individual gain or private advantage. Protection was never dreamed of by the framers of the Constitution, unless it was that incidental protection which follows inevitably from the laying of a tariff for the purposes of a revenue.

I do not mean to dwell upon the constitutional question that is involved. I do not mean to trench upon the patience of this committee by asking it to listen to my protest, as I feel I have the right to do under the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, against the Senate ever originating a bill like this. It never belonged there; it belongs exclusively within the jurisdiction of this House.

I do not forget that the present occupant of the chair ruled, and with perfect candor and impartiality I am sure, that this bill was not a revenue bill. That was before this discussion began. But I do insist that the Senate had no power under the seventh section of that article of the Constitution to originate this bill, or any bill like this.

However that may be, it is here, and we must deal with it, and deal with it in the light of the tariff and its operations as we find it to-day. I am glad that this discussion has at least proven that we are all united in reference to the necessity of a revision of the existing tariff.

It finds no advocate upon this floor. None so poor to do it reverence. No one yet has proven himself bold enough to clamor for its retention in its present shape. I hazard nothing in the assertion that this war tariff under which we live to-day stands without precedent or parallel in the history of this or any other country. No tariff, from the organization of this Government till now, under which labor has ever groaned, was so sweeping in its embrace, so severe in its exactions, so repugnant to every sense of fair dealing or right, as the one that we have this day.

I do not fear to declare that from the organization of society down till now there never was a scheme emanating from human ingenuity so deftly put together, so cleverly constructed, so utterly subversive of every principle of justice among men as the present protective-tariff system of this land. To make it palatable it has encircled in its slimy coils the rice of the Carolinas, the sugar of Louisiana, the hemp of Kentucky and Missouri, and the wool of the South and the West—all sops thrown to an insatiate Cerberus—stool-pigeons used for the purpose of perpetuating the class legislation by which protected Eastern industries batten and fatten upon the labor of other sections, and to gain allies from quarters where they had no right to look for succor. I will not leave the gentleman from Michigan in doubt, when I have done, as to where at least one member of the Democratic party stands upon this tariff issue.

This tariff so drafted, so working, is not defended, but it is excused. Its crimes are sought to be palliated by those who tell us that it has but one purpose, and that the protection of American labor from competition with the pauper labor of foreign countries. This is specious, this is false; and I cannot believe that those who declare it are sincere in their utterances. No man will deny that more than 85 per cent. of all our exports are the product of the agriculturists of this country and that they are forced to find sale in foreign countries. No man will deny that the manufacturer sends abroad less than 1 per cent., less than one-half of 1 per cent., less than one-third of 1 per cent. of his products to these foreign markets. No man will deny that the foreign market of necessity determines the price at home. No man will dare deny that under the operation of this tariff you have built up a home market in which the Eastern manufacturer sells 99¾ per cent. of all his products where a protective tariff excludes the competition of pauper labor, and forces the great wealth-builder, who digs and delves in the earth for its return, into that foreign market in open competition with all the pauper labor beneath the sun.

Is this protection to American labor? We buy from England twenty-five millions of her manufactured goods annually, and send her in return less than three millions of ours; the difference must be made good by delivery of the farmer's product to the English consumer at such price as may be had in the English market. Do you gentlemen who advocate this bill undertake to tell the country that in your vocabulary no man upon the American continent is entitled to be enrolled upon the scroll of honor as a producer or a laborer unless he is one of those white slaves who toil out their lives in the factory or the machine shop of his commercial master?

I have before me the very able and exhaustive speech which the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RUSSELL,] a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, made upon this bill on the 29th day of March last. That gentleman tells us that we need not worry ourselves about a reduction of tariff rates, because he says that the adoption of such a course will not reduce the price of the manufactured article. He tells us in this speech that we have but one hope, and that is to be based upon home competition. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a right to deal with the issue as the gentleman from Massachusetts presents it. I have read carefully that and other speeches made from the same stand-point. I do not believe that the gentleman from Massachusetts shows less ability than any of his colleagues on the committee or any of the gentlemen who have spoken from his side. Equally able, thoroughly informed, he is at the same time more candid and more fair in many respects than others that I might cite.

He tells us in this connection that we are to depend upon home competition for a reduction of the price of manufactured goods; that a reduction of the tariff will have no effect whatever in that respect. Yet he stands the avowed champion and protector of American labor. Now, let us see where his theory will lead. How will home competition ever reduce prices until the home supply has overreached the home demand? There can be no reduction of price so long as combination among manufacturers is possible. There can be no reduction of price until the demand at home falls below the supply which the home producer offers. When that happens I grant you a reduction of price will come. But what else will come? As certainly as night follows day there must be other results—a diminution of employment and a reduction of wages; otherwise the manufacturer must pocket that reduction of price himself; and I know no instance in which his philanthropy has ever permitted him to adopt such a policy. A reduction of wages and a diminution of employment must come at the same instant that a reduction of price is brought about by home competition. And thus we find the self-constituted champion and defender of American labor reducing the laborer to the very condition from which he promised and avowed he would save him.

There is nothing but sophistry in all this argument. We know some things by intuition, and they do not need to be demonstrated. We know it is not a fair system of legislation when the earnings of one man are transferred without consideration to the pockets of another.

You tell me—I heard the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] yesterday assert that his policy was to protect all American industries. You cannot protect one man except at the expense of another man. If you protect every diversified interest and labor in this country and protect them equally, what good, I beg of you, has come of that? You have robbed me for that man's benefit and plundered him to give me back that which you took from me. That is arguing in a circle. It is illogical. It is sophistical. It is an insult to the intelligence of the House or the country.

Mr. CHACE. Did I understand him a few moments ago to say that 84 per cent. of the agricultural products——

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman did so understand me either he failed to catch my language or I failed to make myself clear. He understood me to say that 86 per cent. of all our exportations went from the agricultural and producing classes of the country. That is what I said. If I did not, I certainly meant to say it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRUMM,] who prompts the gentleman from Rhode Island, should ask his own questions and not attempt to do it by substitute.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. What per cent. is that of the entire agricultural products of the whole country?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will give the gentleman the whole of it. I do not wish to go into the detail of figures. I tell you that 70 per cent. of the six millions of bales of cotton raised in this country find their market abroad. I tell you that 34 per cent. of all cereals raised in this country are sold outside of the limits of this land. You do not deny—no man will—that the price fixed in the foreign market determines the price at home. So you force the producer, who is, as I have declared, the wealth-builder of this land, to sell his whole product, whether at home or abroad, upon the price that is fixed and determined in the open markets of the world. You let the home manufacturer sell 99⅞ per cent. of all his product in a protected market with an average of 43 per cent. in the nature of royalty and bounty to his pocket. That is what I mean to say.

More than two-thirds of our annual importations are subject to tariff rates ranging from 10 to 780 per cent., making an average for the last fiscal year of 43¼ per cent.; and this you term protection to American labor! Why not be fair; why not call things by their proper names; why not tell the truth and say, that under this guise of hypocrisy you seek to protect nothing and do protect nothing except the capital invested in manufactures; and further, that such protection is secured only at the expense of all the productive industries of the land?

If you are honest and mean to tell the truth when you say that you seek to protect American labor, why not make your duties on raw material proportionate to your duties on the manufactured article? You strive to protect the labor employed in the manufacture of the article, why not protect equally the labor employed in the production of the article?

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman must know that the New England manufacturer has to pay more for his agricultural products on account of the duty on those articles.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman, I hope, will not make a speech in my time, for he has had his hour and I have given away a part of mine, and to his own side, when it would not allow one of its advocates to go on.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I mean to say is this: this is not fair-dealing and you cannot persuade the people of this country that it is. The American people will not be long in wearying of such driveling selfishness, such transparent hypocrisy, such maudlin nonsense. Do you want evidence and proof conclusive? I am going to leave it for the members of the Committee on Ways and Means to furnish all the details that are necessary in the discussion of this question. They may be able to do that. They have well told us by this bill that as to the general features of the management of the tariff question they were compelled to plead the infant act. They have told us they were not able to deal with the tariff under which this country's revenues are to be raised, but they may be able to furnish the data they propose this commission shall gather.

It is a pitiable confession for a committee to make, parading before this House and this country its lack of ability, its incompetency, its imbecility. It is a degrading confession which, in the estimation of all people, will stamp this Committee on Ways and Means as even worse and weaker than either of its immediate predecessors, and Heaven knows this exhausts comparison. Of course, when I speak of the present Committee on Ways and Means, I speak of the majority side, excluding from all criticism the honorable gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] for to him I tender my acknowledgments and thanks for the able, honest, bold, and manly speech which he delivered in opposition to this measure.

But take the general results. Under a revenue-tariff system of 23 per cent., in the decade beginning in 1850 and ending in 1860, the great agricultural producing State of Illinois shows a disproportionate accumulation of wealth as against the State of Pennsylvania.

But take the decade beginning in 1860 and ending in 1870, and you find the six New England States under the operation of this war tariff, with Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey added, making nine in all, being the oldest States on this continent, whose reservoir of population was full, which had no lands to open, no additional resources to develop, with constantly dwindling population, gathering wealth beyond all precedent. You find from the census of 1860 that of the $16,159,616,068 that constituted the national wealth, $5,591,607,424 was located in these nine States, or an average of 34.60 per cent. of the whole. That was in 1860, but under the operation of a high protective tariff in 1870 the wealth of this country had nearly doubled. It was $30,068,518,507. How stood it with our nine Eastern protected States? They surely should have been content if they were able to maintain their percentage of one-third as against the expanding, undeveloped, and growing West and South. But mark all of you, that these nine States in 1870 held $15,290,032,687 of the $30,068,518,507 which constituted the aggregate wealth of this country in 1870, showing, instead of 34 per cent. of the whole wealth of the country, in ten years, under a protective tariff, they had gone to 50.85 per cent.

This is the table which the Bureau of Statistics terms "the true value." I have the assessed values here before me, as well as the true value, which I have given, and it is officially dated, not twenty-four hours old, from the chief of the Bureau of Statistics. So that in ten years' time these nine States went from about one-third to more than one-half of the aggregate wealth of the whole country. The census for 1880 is not out. Its tables are not furnished. We cannot undertake to state authoritatively what the last decade may show to be the condition of this people, but I take it that he would not be a bold man who would declare his honest conviction that within the next three months, when this information will be given to the country, you will find the same nine States have reached at least 66⅔ per cent. of the aggregate wealth of the thirty-eight States comprising this Union. Will some advocate or some apologist of the protective-tariff system tell me why that should be so? Assuredly New England did not make these gigantic and disproportionate strides to wealth by reason of any natural advantages which she may possess.

I do not mean to make war upon New England or to make war upon her people. She has much of which she has just cause to be proud; the energy, the inventive genius, the cultivation, the intelligence, the perseverance, and the virtues of her people; but we know that unaided by any other than the natural resources of the soil and climate of that section she could not come in open competition with the rest of this country, and without their assistance starvation and decay would overtake her instead of this abnormal accumulation of wealth transferred to her through abnormal channels. She has not the fertility of soil, she has not the generous climate, nor has she the natural resources that would enable her even to keep pace with the great development of this great country. And yet we are confronted by figures like these that I have quoted; we are looking straight into the face of results which cannot be explained except by means of that class legislation—unfair, unjust, illiberal—which transfers one man's earnings to another man's pockets; a system of exaction that takes from honest toil to enrich dishonest jugglery.

Mr. Chairman, against this abnormal condition of affairs we mean to protest. But our friends who are advocating this bill tell us that we are in a condition now where we may lighten the load and lift a part of the burden that bears so heavily upon the people of this land. They say we are in a condition where our Treasury is overflowing with surplus revenues, and that our taxation may be abated. Although pressed to give relief to the country by a repeal of the unjust exactions of the tariff, the leading men who favor that system tell us no; they are going to strike down the internal-revenue system. This Government, Mr. Chairman, has but two sources of revenue—its import duties and receipts from internal revenue. The time was when we were told that these manufacturing industries needed to be fostered and protected by the Government because of their very infancy; and there are those yet surviving who make this puling cry for struggling infant industries—industries that are now passing into the second century of their existence, and still unable to put off their swaddling clothes.

I suggest to gentlemen upon the other side of the House that it would be well to change the note of this music. Let them break up the monotony and give us a rest. Shift your plea and ask now of this country for a continuation or perpetuation of your protection system upon the ground of age instead of infancy. Tell the country that we have fostered your industries until they have grown hoary with age and are tottering beneath the accumulated burdens which you have allowed them to gather from the struggling people of this country. Tell them that they are no longer self-sustaining and must go down unless protection shall be made permanent.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have said that this Government has but two sources of revenue. Its Treasury relies only upon the duties derived from imposts and the collections from the internal-revenue system of taxation. We know no others. Now, our protectionist friends in this House tell us that they will give us relief from a portion of the burdens by striking down the internal-revenue system of taxation, but will not touch the tariff. My cherished and much venerated friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] will agree to that, I am sure. He bows his assent. I knew he would; and why? Because it is the only desperate chance left for him and his colleagues to maintain their cherished idol of pillage and plunder at the public expense. Strike down your tariff system and——

Mr. KELLEY. If I do not interrupt the gentleman I would like to ask him a question—the same question I asked the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether a reduction of duties, by stimulating importations, does not as a first effect increase the revenue?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It depends altogether upon the method of reduction you adopt. But I will answer the gentleman more at length hereafter. Now, let us see whether you strike down this system of internal revenue in order to relieve the overtaxed people. I grant that it is an offensive system of raising revenue. Like the tariff, it too was born of a state of war. It is inquisitorial in its very essence. It is inequitable in its operations. It is unfair and unjust in its distribution of public burdens.

But let us see if it is not yet, in spite of all that, the lesser of the two existing evils. The internal system of taxation has paid into the coffers of this Government from the date of its establishment in round numbers as much as your tariff system has done in the same length of time. They have each paid in about $3,000,000,000. There was a time when your internal-revenue system of taxation yielded you $300,000,000 annually; to-day it yields about $135,000,000; while your receipts from customs are now about $200,000,000 annually.

Why strike down the one and leave the other intact? In the dark hour of this country's history and trials, in the midst of its calamities, when the besom of war's wild destructive breath was sweeping over this land, you called the internal-revenue system into existence, and it has served your purpose faithfully and well. It has raised millions of revenue annually and beggared fewer people than has your tariff system. But you say now it should be abolished.

Now, let us deal fairly with this question of the tariff; let us be perfectly frank in testing its results. Suppose you abolish the internal-revenue taxes; you will have lessened the revenues of this country by $135,000,000 annually, and to that extent and no further you will have relieved the taxpayers of this country.

But suppose that on the contrary you let the internal taxes stand and revise your tariff until you cut down its receipts $135,000,000 annually, you will have taken not a dollar more from the Treasury than the other method would have done; but you will have lightened the burdens of taxation on the people, not to the extent of $135,000,000 of money only, but to an extent variously estimated at from two to five times that amount.

It has been estimated by an eminently competent authority that under your protective-tariff system the people of this country since 1861 have paid $12,000,000,000 as a bounty or royalty to home manufacturers, not one dollar of which ever found its way into the Federal Treasury. This is more than double the aggregate cost of the late protracted war.

Now, I ask if these two constitute the only resources that the Government knows, if they together and jointly are furnishing the revenues of the country, then if the overtaxed and overburdened people of the country are justly clamoring for relief, tell me, in common fairness, and employ naught but common sense, which is it to the interest of the people to do?

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. With pleasure.

Mr. KELLEY. Is there any impost duty that amounts to the rate of taxation that the spirit tax imposes on every bushel of corn before permitting its first grade in manufacture to be put on the market?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. There is imposed on a bushel of corn a tax of $3.60 before its grower can put its first result in proof spirits on the market.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman and tell him "no." But I will tell him further, that he is mistaken if he expects to swear me in as a recruit to advocate and vindicate the establishment of his internal-revenue system. I answer his question "no," because that very article to which he refers, in which my State and my people are so largely interested—my own district paying into the Federal Treasury more than a million of dollars annually as a tax levied on that one manufactured article—I tell him that the article is taxed 300 per cent. on its actual value. The whisky is worth but 30 cents a gallon when first made, and it is taxed at the rate of 90 cents a gallon.

My people are bearing that burden, and I speak for them; not for them alone but for the people of all this broad country. I declare that iniquitous as that tax is you had better leave it, if you will reduce this tariff and correct its unjust exactions, because in that direction you will give more relief to the people. [Mr. KELLEY rose.] The gentleman I know need not be assured that I want to be perfectly courteous to him, but he will remember how little time I have. However, I will yield to him.

Mr. KELLEY. A bushel of corn makes four gallons of spirits.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then the tax is a still more grievous outrage. I have sought to be fair. Some say that for every dollar that is paid into the Treasury two dollars are paid by the people. I am one of those who say that for every dollar of money that is carried to the Treasury through this tariff system, five more are placed on the already bowed backs of the taxpayers of this land.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] tells us that a tariff in order to be protective must be prohibitory. I am sure that I am not misquoting him; but if he thinks I am I will send his speech to the Clerk's desk and ask that the marked passages be read. He says this:

Therefore a tariff cannot be adjusted on a certain article to serve the double purpose of revenue and protection. It must either be at a point to check importation and thus protect, or it must be at a point low enough to admit importation and thus produce a revenue. That is, when fixed at a revenue point it ceases to protect, and when fixed at a protective point it ceases to yield a revenue.

Mr. RUSSELL. I only ask that if the gentleman quotes from my definition of the tariff he will quote the whole text of that definition, or at least insert it in his speech.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will agree that the gentleman from Massachusetts may indicate what shall be inserted. I have myself been made the victim of garbled quotations before now, where gentlemen did not hesitate to stop at semicolons or commas. I tell the gentleman now that I have read three full sentences from his speech. I am willing that he shall indicate what further he wishes to be quoted.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have here a copy of that speech and will ask that the following be inserted:

This term is ambiguous and misleading—an ingenious one for its purpose. It is interpreted in sections inclined to free trade to mean free trade, and in sections inclined to protection (and there a dangerous doctrine for party success) it is claimed that it has in it elements of protection.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] in his recent speech, after paying a high compliment to the superiority of our workmen and machinery, says, "Can it be possible that this people thus conditioned need more protection than a strictly revenue tariff will give to preserve their home market and their home manufactures?" How deceptive! There is no protection in a strictly revenue tariff—that is, to an American manufacture; for if a revenue is to be derived from an imported article it must be imported, which certainly involves its manufacture elsewhere, and the rate of duty must be so fixed as to invite its importation. Therefore a tariff cannot be adjusted on a single article to serve the double purpose of revenue and protection. It must either be at a point to check importation and thus protect, or it must be at a point low enough to admit importation and thus produce a revenue. That is, when fixed at a revenue point it ceases to protect, and when fixed at a protective point it ceases to yield a revenue.

A tariff for revenue and protection requires the division of articles of import into two classes, one for revenue and one for protection, adjusting the duty upon the various articles of merchandise we have facilities to and desire to manufacture here to the protective point, or to that point that will enable our manufacturers to pay American wages and compete with the foreign manufacturer with foreign wages; and selecting such articles of necessity or luxury as cannot well be produced here, upon which to impose a duty for revenue.

A protective tariff not only involves the manufacture of the necessaries of civilized life in our own country by our own citizens, but makes it possible, through higher wages, to maintain our working classes on a higher plane of civilization than is enjoyed by any other people. This is the principle involved in a protective tariff—nothing more, nothing less.

It is neither necessary nor politic to fix a protective tariff so high as to encourage combinations for unreasonable profits, although we have passed that period in the history of this country when such combinations can exist. Our industries are too widespread, capital is too eager for investment, skill and enterprise too ready, to permit for any length of time unreasonable profits. In fact, an over-high tariff would bring about an unhealthy competition among ourselves. No wise protectionist asks it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, I do not believe that a tariff to be protective must be prohibitory. On the contrary, I believe that no tariff can provide a revenue without giving some degree of protection. I do believe, however, that more than 100 years have gone by without evolving from the brain of man a more valuable and irrefutable contribution to the science of political economy (if indeed it has ever reached the plane of the sciences) than the declaration of Adam Smith in his "Wealth of Nations," when he declared that "where protection begins there revenue ends." Protection does not bring revenue. To that extent the gentleman from Massachusetts is right. But revenue must of necessity bring protection. And now, in order to be distinctly understood by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] I will tell him that this is the only species of protection I would ever be induced to submit to or to favor—that which you cannot avoid, which comes of necessity from the very effort that you make for the raising of revenue. I would agree to that much protection and none other.

If this country was in a normal condition, if this Government was not in debt, if it was not compelled to impose customs duties and internal-revenue taxation not only for the defraying of its current expenses but the meeting of the interest on the public debt and the creation of a sinking fund to discharge the principal at maturity, if we were as a Government in a normal condition, I openly declare that I would be an avowed and an absolute free-trader. I would not raise revenue by crippling commerce or putting the producers of my country at a disadvantage with the labor of the earth.

But we are in a situation from which we cannot at present extricate ourselves. We are told that capital is very timid, and that the country is afraid if the Democratic party should return to power that it would disturb the vast sums which have been invested in the manufacturing industries of the land. I do not believe that the country entertains such fears. It would not be the part of prudence or wisdom, the act would be lacking in the essentials of justice if we should adopt any policy that would cripple the investments made in that direction. I believe that this tariff should be revised, looking to bringing it to a point for the raising of revenue only, with a fixed purpose to make it a revenue tariff and not a protective tariff. I believe that this is the true policy; and I mean to advocate it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts told us that this tariff had done many great and good things for the American people. He has made, in my judgment, (and I state it in candor and in justice to him,) the strongest and most plausible presentation of his case that has been submitted from his side in either House. He has praised this tariff for good deeds that it never did; he has sought to excuse it for sins and crimes that it has perpetrated. He told us that the war had swept the shipping interests of this country from the sea. Now, in Heaven's name, Mr. Chairman, the war did enough that is to be deplored; but it never did that, and you know it. Your enrolled and registered tonnage was as heavy in 1865 when the war ended as it was in 1861 when the war began. There was but an infinitesimal difference. The war did not sweep the shipping of this country from the seas.

Mr. RUSSELL. The ocean carrying-trade decreased; but the coast-bound trade increased.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Oh, yes; and the gentleman will not deny the figures which I hold; for I quote from the speech of a very distinguished Senator of the gentleman's own party, made in the other wing of this Capitol, and which passed unchallenged. Your enrolled and registered tonnage was as heavy when the war ended as when it began. You lost your tonnage after 1865, and you know why you lost it. You lost it by reason of the provisions of your protective tariff, which threw its sheltering ægis over the iron screw steamship in the war that it made upon the wooden ships. Cancer-like it ate out the very vitals of this great established American industry. Do not charge that to the war.

The gentleman tells us that it is time now for the South to come up to the doctrine of protection. I trust not. He points to different sections of that portion of the country, and says that light is dawning upon them, and they will soon fall into line. He tells us that the South has been neglected, or, rather, has neglected her own opportunities, and failed to take advantage of the workings of protection.

Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to protest my absolute and entire devotion to that people or that section. That is a matter of record. There is no sacrifice that I ever failed to make for the South when she called for it to be tendered. There is no sacrifice that I will not now gladly make to contribute to the material prosperity and the building up of the commercial power of that people. But I do not want even my own section to grow rich if she must do it by the plunder of her neighbors. I do not want New England to continue to grow rich by pillage practiced upon the West and the South. I do not want the West to advance her interests at the expense of the South or the East. The question upon which these sections divided has been disposed of.

I am truly thankful that there is not left in the political horizon of to-day a single sectional question to be discussed or to be determined. All such questions have been eliminated from American politics. We are not here to legislate for sections. This issue was referred to the stern arbitrament of battle. The sword has traced in blood its irrevocable decree declaring that this country is and shall continue to be indivisible. If I cherish one aspiration or one ambition now, I do declare it is by fair dealing to contribute even my mite to the promotion of the welfare and the advancement of the material interests of a common country, in which I and mine, as no man will deny, hold again a common interest. [Prolonged applause.]

He tells us this is a party question. So say I. You do not throw down that gage of battle one instant too soon for me. I so declare, and to the extent of the last atom of power I possess it shall be made, and it shall be held and continued as the dividing line of parties. He says that the speeches in the other wing of the Capitol and the votes on this bill and the speeches in this House demonstrate it is a party issue. I say so too.

I want to see that line drawn as sharply as it is possible to define it. I want to see the fighting forced on that line. I want to see the Republican party on one side declare that in future Congresses it will lay claim to no adherents save those who advocate a protective tariff, and the Democracy declare it has no interest or claim upon the man who traces his politics to such a creed. I want that. This issue was thrust upon us toward the close of the last national campaign in the States of Ohio and Indiana. The boldness, if not the reckless courage that marked the conduct of our opponents extorts our admiration. The ill-considered prudence, the timidity with which our leaders slunk away from its discussion then excites no feeling but contempt.

The gentleman from Massachusetts comes here advocating the passage of this bill. Mark you what he says of it! He says he was opposed to this bill in the Committee on Ways and Means. He says he resisted its adoption in that committee: "It is for this reason I urge early action on the tariff, because it needed revision, but your Committee on Ways and Means in reporting this bill virtually, so far as they are concerned, delegated the whole matter to the commission. I therefore shall vote for the commission bill in the House as the now speediest way of reaching a result." If there is any authority I have a right to quote as to what the scope of the pending measure is as to its objects, purposes, and results, tell me if I do not find warrant for assuming the gentleman from Massachusetts has given it to us correctly. He says so far as the Committee on Ways and Means is concerned it has delegated this whole matter to the commission which this bill proposes to raise. What whole matter? The whole matter of a revision of a tariff.

Mr. McLANE. That is not so?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If that is so, then I ask you to find within the limits of that Federal Constitution the authority this House has to delegate its exclusive power over the matter of raising the revenue for this Government? You are acting outside of the Federal Constitution, and every man within the sound of my voice knows it. It is not only extra-constitutional, it is anti-constitutional, if the gentleman from Massachusetts has fairly and correctly interpreted the provisions and purposes of this bill. I believe he is right, I mean practically, and I want to enter a protest in the shape of a prediction right now that if you pass this bill, if you raise this commission, it will take this testimony and make its report predicated and based on ex parte evidence, and when it is brought into this House we will be told we must not touch it; that its provisions have been adjusted relatively to each other; that the whole field has been covered by nine employed and hired experts; and that not a scintilla of tax there proposed but what bears its relation to each and every other provision of that report.

You will be told, if Congress undertakes to tamper with it, that it will find itself at sea; that it will mar the symmetry of the whole structure; that it will be acting imprudently, hastily, ill-advisedly, and unwisely; and under such appeals as that, that side of the House will undertake to rush that report through and crystallize it into law. The gentleman from Massachusetts is right. The passage of this bill is the parting forever by the American Congress with its power over the system of taxation.

Mr. RUSSELL. The bill itself will define the duty of the commission, and not anything I have said. Of course the committee will have to revise any report they make and formulate a bill, though certainly not at this session of Congress if in fact they have time in the next session.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir; I have the bill before me, but I choose to take the interpretation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which was deliberately uttered, put into the records of this House, and which I cordially indorse and fully agree with.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to trench on the patience of this House or to exceed my time. I do not expect to have the slightest influence on the vote of a member of this body. I do not expect to do more than satisfy my own conscience in entering a protest against what I believe to be ill-considered, hasty, dangerous, and unconstitutional legislation.

I do not want the sovereign power of this great Government of fifty millions of people to be parted with and doled out to a lot of irresponsible men, no one of whom is to be named on this floor to-day.

I do not want a packed jury to pass upon this issue. I do not want a lot of broken-down political hacks to become the repository of the sovereign legislative revenue power of fifty millions of people. I wish simply to plead for an honest, judicious, wise, prudent, and gradual reduction of the tariff exactions. I want it to come from this House. I want it to come from the organization of the House to which this business is committed.

If you gentlemen of the majority are afraid to trust your side, wipe out your present Committee on Ways and Means and let the Speaker make another. I do not, in the light of the introduction of this bill, believe he could make it much worse. When the committee pleads its own stultification and says it is not able to grapple with the question which the Constitution of the country and the rules of the House have put in its keeping, I am for one willing they shall go into retirement. Our side on this question is more than willing to leave in the hands of the minority of that committee these great vital interests of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I move it be extended.

Mr. KENNA. I will take the floor, and cheerfully yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I sincerely thank the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] for their courtesy and kindness. I shall not go further in the discussion of these issues, but I will ask permission, however, which has been accorded to gentlemen who have preceded me, to incorporate what I have not been able to say in my printed remarks as they will appear in the RECORD.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa, in his speech on this measure, presented to the House, it seems to me, a peculiarly glowing view of what we might expect from a continuance of the system, but which, I beg leave to say to the gentleman, this country has never yet enjoyed as a result of its operation.

I protest that I cannot agree either with him or with his colleague from Massachusetts on the Committee on Ways and Means that the passage of this bill means a speedy revision of the tariff. We will have no revision of that tariff under this measure, and no revision will ever come as a product of this commission. No gentleman believes that it is intended for that purpose. I know it is ungracious to deal with private motives. I believe this is a measure of delay. I believe that its results will accord with its attributed purposes. I believe it was fairly characterized the other day by one of the most brilliant men on this continent, himself a staunch Republican, as "an affidavit for a continuance." That is my estimate of this measure, its purposes and its results.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman from Kentucky state if he thinks that was the intention of the gentleman who originally introduced this bill in the Senate?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I was as much opposed to this bill when it emanated from the hand of that honest, staunch, sturdy old Connecticut Democrat in the Senate as I am now when it is left in the charge of the gentleman from Iowa, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from Massachusetts in this House.

But the gentleman from Iowa, in the handsome peroration with which he concludes his able speech on this bill, tells of all the benefits that were to come, and of the thrift and prosperity and the universal happiness which were to be spread throughout the land as a condition of our allegiance to the present high protective tariff system. He even furnished the music in order to set off the scene. He tells of the fabled music of the spheres, which never as yet greeted mortal ears, and his anxiety to produce it by reason of judicious and wise revenue legislation. He tells of the whir of the engine, the hum of the spindle, the ring of the anvil; but the great body of American laborers are not made to play any part, nor are their voices heard in this grand chorus.

I, too, Mr. Chairman, would like to have the country made vocal with the music of multiplied industries. But I would have no jarring or discordant notes to mar its symphony. I, too, would have the whir of the engine, the hum of the spindle, and the ring of the anvil; but I would mingle with it the joyous song of the contented plowman as he follows from dawn till dark the turning glebe which must at last give food and sustenance to all. [Applause.] I would have that grand and glorious melody supplemented by the ringing laugh of happy childhood as it gathers at close of day about the farm-house door, the vine-clad cottage of the mechanic, and the humble home of the delving miner. I would wreathe the face of every honest toiler with the smile that comes of content and thrift, instead of leaving it wet with tears. I would make each citizen of this great land believe that he is the equal of his fellow; I would have him know that he is free—commercially free, as well as politically free, wearing no shackles, standing erect, receiving protection from rendering loyal homage to his country upon exact equality with all. [Applause.]

I would make each citizen of ours love his country, not as a mere sentiment, but because of its just and equal laws. I would have him feel that he rested secure in his every right beneath the broad protecting ægis of a great, a just, a powerful Republic. I would write that Republic's motto and blazon it upon her shield and give it to the world; I would make it so broad and catholic that parties should not divide upon it, and no man might gainsay. I would make it read: Protection for each citizen abroad, justice and equality for each citizen at home. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PAYSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 328) to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1168) to amend the several acts in relation to the division of the State of Mississippi into judicial districts, and further to amend the several acts in relation to the northern judicial district of the State of Mississippi, and to provide for the times and places of holding the United States district courts in said northern district.

TARIFF-COMMISSION.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Chairman, in a service of four or five years in this House, I do not remember to have known a measure involving so simple and short a proposition to provoke so wide and extensive a discussion. I regret exceedingly that members who have preceded me in a four weeks' debate have not found it to their convenience and to their taste to discuss the particular bill and the special measure by which this House for that length of time has been confronted, instead of discussing the tariff question as an abstraction. Now, if I may be pardoned by the House, I propose in the few minutes which I shall occupy to-day to confine myself to this bill; and if I may be further pardoned, I propose in the discussion of the bill to deal with equal frankness with both sides of the House in stating the facts which shall control my action.

I deny that the question of high protection or of tariff for revenue or of free trade is involved in the measure which is now presented for our consideration. It does involve the proposition that the existing tariff of this country shall be revised. And I am glad to hail the time at last in the history of the House of Representatives when a proposition heretofore denied, on one side at least, now meets with universal concurrence and acceptance here.

I remember the time when a bill pending before this House for a revision of the tariff, and which had been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, was met with a proposition to strike out the enacting clause. I remember to have voted against striking out the enacting clause of that bill for the reason that I then favored, as I now favor, a revision of the tariff.

And I remember further that in the campaign in my district which followed I was met everywhere by a letter emanating from a member of that committee and a gentleman who now has the honor of presiding over its deliberations, in which it was avowed that a vote cast in this House against striking out the enacting clause of that bill was essentially a free-trade vote, and that a vote for striking out the enacting clause was a vote for protection.

The issue was thus sought to be made that the tariff as it is must be accepted and that the protectionists of the country would accept no other. I need hardly undertake to establish a fact so well understood in this House at the time, that the effort to maintain the existing tariff without change or revision was practically an effort to perpetuate a system that was and is sectional in its character and unequal and unjust in its operations. I believed then and I believe now that no man can justify a tariff, whether based on a protection or a revenue idea, which is so devised as to impose all its burdens on one section of the country and to confer all its benefits on another. Whatever may be the differences of opinion on the subject of protection and free trade, the large revenues demanded by the necessities of the Government will require the imposition of duties on so many articles of importation as to give practical protection to a great variety of interests. I am not alarmed at the surplus accruing to the Treasury. I am glad to see it and I hope to witness its application to the extinguishment of the public debt, so that our bonds, instead of flooding the markets in competition with every private borrower, may be paid as rapidly as the nature of the obligations will allow, thus sending into active industries and to general employments the vast amount of capital they have served to lock up in the vaults. But the tariff as it now exists is sectional. It gives benefits to the North and East which have made them rich while it imposes burdens on the South and West which have kept them poor.

I am glad, therefore, to hail the time when members may rise here and avow their purpose to support measures looking to a revision of the tariff, without being confronted with the naked declaration that the man who ventures to raise his voice against the existing order of things must essentially be on one side or the other in reference to protection or free trade. I have been impressed by the fact, in the course of the lengthy discussion upon this measure, that no one now dares to defend the existing tariff. It is condemned by the protectionist and free-trader alike and its revision universally demanded.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman something about the letter which I understood him to say I sent into his district.

Mr. KENNA. It was a letter signed W. D. Kelley. It was written to a prominent Greenbacker in my district, and used in support of the Greenbacker, who was the candidate against me of the combined Republican and Greenback parties. It was made use of to give the interpretation of others and not my own interpretation to my vote, and it served to mislead many well-meaning people with reference to that vote.

Mr. KELLEY. I hear of it now for the first time. I have no recollection of having written such a letter. I will say more, that I have never written a letter, to my recollection or knowledge, and sent it into the district of any gentleman who was a candidate on either side. I have gone into districts and spoken. I am inclined, therefore, to think that the letter was a forgery. I regret that the gentleman did not bring it to my attention at the time.

Mr. KENNA. I am glad to have the disavowal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania with reference to that letter. It is a fact that is well known throughout my district that such a letter as I have described was published and sent broadcast through the district and used with reference to the sole issue that I have mentioned.

My purpose, however, in referring to the matter at this time, as I trust the gentleman will understand, was not to criticise him in connection with that letter, but to emphasize the proposition that from the condition of things then existing in this House and in this country there has been a change which brings us now to confront the fact that this House is a unit in favor of a revision of the existing tariff. No man defends it, and it is a matter of some gratification to me to realize that my vote for a revision of the tariff in 1878 is vindicated by the general demand on both sides of the House for a revision now.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, in justice to myself, I will say that in my long Congressional career I can remember having written two letters used in Congressional campaigns. One was for one of the colleagues of the gentleman, and the other was for a gentleman then a candidate in Illinois, who was elected. I wrote those letters to them upon my own convictions, but upon the suggestions of the gentlemen who used them and for whose advantage they were used. I can remember no third letter.

Mr. KENNA. I am very glad to have given the gentleman an opportunity to repudiate a letter which was ascribed to him at that time. I felt, as far as I was personally concerned, totally indifferent as to what expression came from anybody with reference to the real issue involved in that vote. I am proud of the good opinions of my fellow-men, but I declare, I trust without any element of egotism or disregard of the good will of others, that I shall always feel indifferent as to the opinion of any man or set of men about my votes in this House, so far as any regard for such opinions might induce me to cast a vote that did not have the concurrence of my judgment and my conscience. I have alluded to this changed condition of things to remind gentlemen around me that the time has passed when in this House or elsewhere any man will rise up to defend the present tariff in this country. It is condemned for its excesses by the free-trader. It is discountenanced for its injustice by the revenue-tariff man, and it is repudiated for its inequalities and sectional discriminations by the protectionist himself. Its revision and readjustment are universally demanded, and if this bill never accomplishes a better object, it has demonstrated that fact to the satisfaction of the country.

I desire now to discuss the bill with reference to the simple question involved in it—a question of method. In 1874, when what was known as the tidal wave swept over this country, it resulted in returning a Democratic majority to this House. I have taken the pains to-day to examine the RECORD with a view to ascertaining precisely what was the Democratic majority on this floor at that time, and I find that it was 64.

The Democratic party of this country at that day demanded, as it now demands, a revision of the tariff. That House undertook a revision of the tariff. Bills were introduced and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and the result was a report of a bill by that committee. That bill was discussed, the discussion of it continuing and being prolonged until finally that Congress ended, and the bill died, and there was then no revision.

In the next Congress there was likewise in this House a Democratic majority. That Congress undertook a revision of the tariff. Bills were introduced. The Committee on Ways and Means spent weeks and months, as my recollection goes, in the preparation of a bill which was finally reported to this House—the bill to which I made allusion a while ago, known as the "Wood tariff bill." I was then in favor of a revision of the tariff, although I never said and am not now prepared to say that I would have been willing to accept the Wood bill as that revision. I voted, however, against striking out its enacting clause, because I wanted this House to have a full opportunity to consider it by sections, to perfect and mature it; and I hoped that such perfection and maturity would be brought about as to enable me to support it. It, however, died the death at the threshold.

The Democratic party had a majority in this House in the Forty-sixth Congress; and whatever may have been done by the Committee on Ways and Means having jurisdiction of these subjects, whatever efforts may have been made, whatever of energy may have been bestowed upon the subject, we are all aware that no bill for the revision of the tariff was ever reported by that committee in that Congress.

Now, in the face of the fact which I assert as historic truth, let it affect whom and what it may, that Democratic majorities in this House in three successive Congresses failed utterly to secure the passage of a bill revising the tariff, I want to know how any man can undertake to assert that there is any better prospect of securing a revision by the same method in this Congress when it is well understood that the Republican majority up till a very recent time denied even the propriety of any revision at all. A majority of the present House is Republican. A majority of the present committee is Republican. They have given us this bill as an ultimatum.

I will state frankly to this side of the House and to the other that as a choice between this proposed method of revising the tariff and a revision by the more direct method which I conceive to be the proper one, I am unhesitatingly in favor of a revision by the House itself, and now. But I say with equal candor, equal frankness, and equal earnestness of purpose, that as a choice between the proposed revision by the aid of a commission and no revision at all, I am for this commission.

I do not like, Mr. Chairman, the effort that has been made by some gentlemen here not only to give political character to the issue which this bill presents but to attach even to the political character thus given to it their own peculiar views as a standard by which other men are to be measured. I would admonish gentlemen on both sides who have indulged in extravagance of expression that the time never was in this world's history when intolerance of opinion was accepted as the best evidence of wisdom. I have endeavored to cultivate a proper respect for the opinions of others, but I say to those who hear me to-day that unless this commission bill pass, unless this commission shall revise the tariff, reporting their revision to be acted on by this House and the other, and unless such report in some form with proper amendments be accepted in the end, I will not undertake to predict the day when any living man will see a revision of the existing tariff. We have demonstrated by six years of Democratic supremacy in this House that we could not do it in the face of the opposition, and it will require very little effort to demonstrate that in any length of time of supremacy of the other political party they will not do it.

Mr. MORRISON. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. KENNA. Not at all.

Mr. MORRISON. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he does not know very well why nothing was done with the tariff in the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress?

Mr. KENNA. I answer that I do. I am perfectly aware that the electoral trouble coming on in the short session of that Congress prevented action then. I am not aware, however, that it prevented action during the long session; and I have never heard any reason suggested that did prevent it, except that with the great variety of interests involved a bill could not be agreed on and sufficient strength secured in this House to support and pass it. I will yield cheerfully to the gentleman if he desires to state any particular reason affecting the matter; for I certainly wish to avoid anything like a misstatement, or any correct statement which is liable to misconstruction.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman from West Virginia will allow me, I think I ought to state in justice to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] who was the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the Forty-fourth Congress, that a Presidential contest was pending during the long session, and it was not deemed to be nor was it a propitious time for undertaking a revision of the tariff. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Subsequently, in the short session, the electoral controversy prevented the consideration of any such measure.

Mr. REED. I think the statement of the gentleman from New York explains the matter very thoroughly.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to say, in the line of the suggestion of my friend from New York, that this House has never during my experience found a time which in its judgment was "propitious" for revising the tariff. The revision has been wanted all the while, but every effort to secure it has failed, and failed in my judgment because of the inherent difficulty which naturally belongs to so vast and complicated a subject.

Mr. MORRISON. Probably I ought to say, in my own justification, having made some effort toward correcting the abuses in the existing tariff, that I introduced in the Forty-fourth Congress a bill which was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and was reported to the House substantially as introduced, at least so far as it affected the older and better organized industries; I mean the manufactures of cotton, wool, iron and steel. After it had been reported and had been considered to the extent of a few speeches being made on it, we got up the controversy about the reduction of the expenditures of the Government; and I spent the last six weeks of the session upon a conference committee with the gentleman from Iowa in making the attempt to reduce those expenditures, in which we met with some success. The tariff bill was ready for consideration at the next session; and we all know what happened then to prevent any further action being taken upon it.

I met those gentlemen who helped me to revise the tariff, some resisting it, at New Orleans, and our attention was called to another question which I do not wish to introduce now.

Mr. REED. I think the explanation of the gentleman from New York satisfies all sides of the House.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from New York was not in charge of the bill.

Mr. REED. I think it had better be left there.

Mr. KENNA. I am good natured, Mr. Chairman, and disposed to yield as much time as gentlemen may desire, if I have it to yield, but I fear I will yield myself off the floor unless I proceed without further interruption. I have promised the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] half of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman declines to yield further the Chair will protect him in his rights.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Chairman, let me not be misunderstood, either in the statement I made with reference to the various failures of this House to secure the passage of a bill to revise the tariff, or in the purpose of that statement. The point I intended to make is embraced in the fact that in my judgment, with the multitude of duties by which members are surrounded, with the handicapped manner by which the rules of the House bring measures into it for consideration, with the thirteen general appropriation bills which come ruthlessly at any and all times to take other measures from the floor, with the Calendar filled from one end to the other with private claims with no practical result whatever, engrossing a large part of the time of Congress, and with the thirty letters which bring daily the demands of our constituents for attention to their mail and other matters in the Departments, the difficulty is inherent in the condition of the House and the character of the work to be done, a difficulty for which, in my judgment, the Democratic party has been in nowise responsible.

Now, what is the bill under consideration? It reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a commission is hereby created to be called the "Tariff Commission," to consist of nine members.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint nine commissioners from civil life, one of whom, the first named, shall be the president of the commission. The commissioners shall receive as compensation for their services each at the rate of $10 per day when engaged in active duty, and actual traveling and other necessary expenses. The commission shall have power to employ a stenographer and a messenger; and the foregoing compensation and expenses to be audited and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, upon a scale of justice to all interests; and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it, said commission, in the prosecution of its inquiries, is empowered to visit such different portions and sections of the country as it may deem advisable.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall make to Congress final report of the results of its investigation, and the testimony taken in the course of the same, not later than the first Monday of December, 1882; and it shall cause the testimony taken to be printed from time to time and distributed to members of Congress by the Public Printer, and shall also cause to be printed for the use of Congress 2,000 copies of its final report, together with the testimony.

At the very threshold, Mr. Chairman, we are met with the proposition that the appointment of this commission is a relegation of the authority and power of this House to a body of irresponsible men. I deny it. They have no power; they can make no law; they investigate; they report to us as our committees every day report. But if their suggestions ripen into law, it must be at our hands. It has been likened to the electoral commission. I deny that it is similar to it in any element of organism or power. The electoral commission was made master of the situation. It gave final decision and bound the House and the country. This commission is without power and can only make itself felt in proportion as its work commends its report to the good sense of those who are to receive it.

We are told it will not do for this House to undertake by this method, or by any other, to derive information from outside sources in aid of the performance of its duties. If that be the case, God help this country!

This is to be a commission of nine men. I assume, and I think I have a right to assume, that they will be appointed with due regard to the broadness and the scope of labor which they are to perform. I will say to my Democratic friends here and now that if they be not so selected, if they fail in the performance of their duty, in a generous, equal, and fair spirit, there will be a power here, and you need not be uneasy on that score, to defeat the consummation of their work. I will say to my Democratic friends, on the other hand, that if that commission be fairly appointed by the President, if men be selected with a view to their ability, with a view to their probity, and especially with reference to their fitness for the peculiar work they are to perform, I have no fear that the result of their labors will excite hostility here or elsewhere.

But the suggestion is made that although the President may not do it the passage of this bill will put it into his power, if he chooses to do it, to select nine men to represent his own or his party's views in reference to the tariff. The answer to any such statement is complete and asolutely convincing, that under the bill I hold in my hand the President of the United States, who will make these selections, can exercise no power in the organization of that commission of nine which the Speaker of this House belonging to his own party cannot exercise in the organization of a committee of this House to deal with the same subject.

Mr. BRIGGS. They are to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. KENNA. It is suggested they are to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. That is true, but I say in so far as the President is concerned, and I do not mean to intimate that he will do otherwise than act fairly in this matter, yet if he do so, and the Senate should permit it, I am ready to help for one to defeat the result of his work.

I trust, and I will go far enough to say I believe, the President will select these men fairly and with due regard to his obligations. He certainly can exercise no power in their selection, he can certainly make no discrimination in their selection, he can certainly accomplish no purpose in their selection, which the Speaker of this House cannot accomplish by the appointment of the Ways and Means Committee.

No bill to revise the tariff can be considered here under the rules of this House unless that committee reports it. That committee of the present House has refused and failed to report such a bill. Expressions from a majority of its members during the pending discussion indicate unmistakably that no such bill can be expected from that committee in this Congress. Hence the inevitable fact that I have endeavored to impress upon the House, that we must accept the proposition to appoint a commission or be content for an indefinite period to submit to the exactions, the sectional discriminations, and the injustice of an existing system which no man, either protectionist, free-trader, or revenue-tariff man has been bold enough to defend. But I repeat that the appointment of a commission yields no power to that body of men. They can only inquire and gather facts and information, and report them to Congress for action by that body.

And, Mr. Chairman, since we can in no other way secure a revision of the tariff, it seems for the same reason likely that we will in no other way secure a revision of the internal-revenue laws of the country. I have struggled with others for years here to find some relief for the tobacco growers from the burdens which oppress them. On more than one occasion a majority of this House has expressed itself favorably toward that relief. Once upon a bill of my own, and again on a bill offered by Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, has such a vote been given, but under the exactions of our arbitrary rules the relief has failed. The internal-revenue system cannot be abolished all at once. I am willing to leave the whisky tax for the present as it is, but the burden upon the producers of tobacco is an enormity, and this Congress ought to hasten to their relief. Failing in every other effort I would direct this commission to make inquiry upon that subject and report a modification of the tobacco law with the rest of their recommendations. In that way we may procure a result which we have failed to realize in any other way, and every tobacco grower in the country would bless the day when the commission was appointed. I shall vote for the appointment of this commission by Congress, and with leave to its members to sit during the session and during the vacation. I would prefer that course, because with the information they gather they can come with their report and be heard on the floor. Failing in that, I shall support the bill as it is.

It will not do for gentlemen to go home and tell their people they opposed this bill because they wanted revision of the tariff now. I tell you that you will get no revision now, and you know it. No man here present will undertake to assert that he believes it possible to secure here at this session of Congress the passage of a bill to revise the tariff. You cannot get it now, and I repeat that you know it.

Mr. CONVERSE. If my friend will allow me I would like to call attention to the fact while he is on this point that his neighboring State in its Democratic State convention last year resolved in favor of this commission for the purpose of procuring data and information for the action of this Congress.

Mr. KENNA. I am obliged to the gentleman from Ohio for the suggestion, and I will add in this connection a fact which is perhaps well known, that the first time this commission bill passed either House of Congress it passed a Democratic Senate. It emanated from Democratic quarters. It was originated by a Democrat. It was first considered by a Democratic body. It passed the Senate, and I most respectfully deny the right of any man to undertake to draw party lines in this House with respect to its consideration here.

We are confronted by the solitary, naked question, of which men who have practical ideas must take cognizance in its application to their respective constituencies, that under the circumstances surrounding us the tariff must be revised by the instrumentality of this commission or it will not be revised.

It is not a choice between methods. It is a choice between the method presented or no revision at all. That is the question which confronts us, disguise it as you may. With nearly six thousand bills pending in this Congress, with every committee overcrowded with measures, with this House under its Republican management further behind than I have ever known it in the consideration of its regular work, with several of the annual appropriation bills, the sundry civil bill, the legislative, executive, and judicial bills, the river and harbor bill, and others unreported, and yet to be considered and passed before the end of the present fiscal year, and with the thousand demands upon time and attention which our daily duties both in and out of the House present, I cannot discover the ground upon which the most sanguine member can hope for favorable action by this House upon the proposed tariff revision at this session or the next. On the contrary, if the commission be appointed with due regard to the letter as well as the spirit of the bill, men must be selected with such qualities of mind and heart as to beget for them the confidence and command for their work the acceptance of the country. Thus we may have in the coming winter, if the commission make report which deserves and receives our favorable consideration, a revision and readjustment of the tariff, which will relieve many unjust burdens, recognize fairly and equitably the interests and the rights of all the classes and sections, and by the correction of existing inequalities and abuses, promote the welfare, the opportunities, and the happiness of our people.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, there is a surplus in our Federal revenues. To the unreflecting this is a sign of wealth. To the reflecting it is perilous. To the deliberative, it is a sign of poverty, in several senses. Party conventions denounced such a surplus. Economy calculated its ultimate losses. Morality deplored the greed and denounced the corrupting devices by which this surplus has accumulated, and is to be grasped. Good men plead for its retention in the pockets of the people as General Jackson advised, and for a speedy demolition of this too conspicuous fiscal monument raised to attract spoliation. The Secretary of the Treasury earnestly asks for its reduction. Even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] confesses that there are excrescences to be removed, incongruities to be corrected, wrongs in interpretation to be corrected at once, and other matters to be remedied and without delay; and yet he follows the protection sentiment, which has but one voice for a commission, one voice for the resignation of our office on this most important duty of legislation!

Excesses in anything are bad. Excessive taxes are very bad. Excessive cost for fuel, shelter, clothing, and food are worse. But all are embraced in an excessive tax or tariff.

Our Federal courts may decide in favor of revenue taxes and against all taxes raised to help trade principally or incidentally. (20 Wallace, 665.) Our financial ideas may be outraged by the leeches who, under the shibboleth of protection, drain industry of its wage and reward; but, sir, no politician of average cunning or brain, unless he live in a locality utterly prostituted by fallacy and selfishness, but will know that the present surplus revenue is an evil and a load. When, therefore, advocacy was made in this House for setting down this bill for action, I knew that it was the intention of those who deftly managed it to continue the present condition of surplus. Especially the mongers in iron, with plausible theory, meant to continue the excesses.

So, Mr. Chairman, when you see a member voting even to take up a bill which is sure to pass, like this, you may know that he is a "business" man and full of sarcasm about doctrinaires and theory. These, sir, are the men who gave and who perpetuate the atrocious system which we are striving to ameliorate or abolish.

Sir, the amount collected for the frugal administration of the Government is in excess of our needs. The excess is over a hundred millions. It is taken out of the popular pocket. It is put here into a big building on Pennsylvania avenue. I emphasize Pennsylvania, for it is the Pennsylvania avenue to the Treasury. [Laughter.] The interest on the debt, not counting sinking fund for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, will be more than a hundred and forty millions beyond our extravagant expenditures. Likely we will have some millions more than I count, and if a tenth of the bills before us become law we will be bankrupt even with the extraordinary surplus.

ESTIMATES AND BILLS.

The total estimates and their additions for the forthcoming appropriations amount nearly to $400,000,000. I trust that they will not be exceeded. But what a pell-mell rush after our surplus do our Calendars present? I have had one of our clerks make a statement by going over all the bills thus far presented. He counted 5,664 bills and 185 joint resolutions. These ask for $627,431,936.62. In addition to this is $16,380,000 for public buildings. There were in further addition on the Speaker's table last week bills amounting to $730,014.26. Still there is to be added 1,190 pension bills!

I say, Mr. Chairman, the largest drain made on this patient people is the drain on their credulity. They are expected to believe that these surpluses are beneficent and needed. They are expected to approve of our postponement and delegation of our duties in reference to this gravest matter of urgent legislation.

May I ask, Mr. Chairman, to place in a brief way before the committee some of the points against this commission? I know commissions are hateful since 1876–'77, when much demoralization ensued by their creation. Because, sir, we gave away our power to a court of high dignity and resort then, on a popular question concerning majorities in a Presidential election, does it follow that we should give it away to a business commission interested only in dividends made out of the interference of Government in the business of the people?

THE COMMISSION.

These are some of the points as I see them against the commission bill:

1. There is an immediate necessity for curtailing the Government revenues. Reason: If we do not, we must use the surplus in one of two ways:

First, in schemes of extravagance, an alternative not to be thought of; not alone because of the injustice of bleeding an overtaxed people for reckless wasting, but also because such wasting is corrupting to every energy of government.

Second, to redeem the bonds. But the Government bonds are the standard security of the country. Our whole financial system (of banks of deposit, banks of issue, trust companies, savings-banks, insurance companies, and general trust funds) is built on the bonds. It will be dangerous to draw away that foundation suddenly. Ergo, we must not pay off our national debt too fast until our financial system is changed. I know what to say when such a change is before us.

2. There is an immediate expediency in reducing taxation. Taxes stand for more than the amount of the burden represented in dollars. They enter into the cost of production; and supposing they enter into the cost of the raw material, they make part of an initial value, which is added to at each change and sale—both by profits, interest, and expenses—until when the finished article reaches the consumer the "tax" may have been rolled up to ten times its original bulk. The industries of the country are even now having strikes and a struggle to live, and especially to make their way in the world's markets; they need immediate relief from needless taxation.

3. While it is easy to bring about a conviction that the tariff is a very complex structure and needs experts to understand it, it is absolute folly to say that glaring abuses are not apparent to the eye of even a superficial analyst. It needs no expert testimony to prove that the duty on steel rails is a fraud. The present rate was put on when the cost of manufacturing rails was five times as great as it is to-day. The duty on copper and copper ore is an obvious swindle. We have the most productive copper mines in the world, and American copper is actually sold cheaper to Englishmen than to Americans. The duty on raw wool is a sop to the farmers which is as much a sham as the duties on wheat; American wools have ruled lower in price since the duty was on than before. The duties on wool and copper are fatal to the extension of our trade with the River Platte countries and Australia.

In a word, there are numerous cases where the slightest examination would discover the advisability of reduction or abolition of duties. Take these now, reduce or abolish them at once; and let your commission go to work too, if you wish!

4. The findings of the commission would be of no more value than the findings which may be now brought out by the opposing discussions of free-traders and protectionists in Congress. Free-trade Congressmen are of course bound to insist that one side of every tariff case is already made up—namely, the side of the people. The reasons for the abolishment of the duty are established by the universal principle. The only testimony, then, is the testimony of the defense, and it is safe to trust those interested to be at Washington in full force to present their views. [Laughter.]

If you would know who will serve on this commission read the petitions sent here for the "Eaton bill." The men who represent the commission in advance represent trades and business, not consumers or farmers—not the people. It is wool, silk, iron, steel, pottery, shoe and leather, cotton and woolen manufacturers, book-pirates, textiles, glass, lumber, salt, paper, cotton, machinery, and those interested to get more out of the people than prudent, unprotected business can honestly produce.

My friend from Kentucky, in an interview, placed the whole matter in its proper light, with a gleam of felicitous facetiæ. Mr. KNOTT was asked as to his opinion of the proposed tariff commission:

"Of course I would not presume to criticise the action of any one else," he said, "especially in advance; but if I should vote for such a measure I think I should feel very much as if I had stultified myself, for I really think that if the chosen representatives of the people feel that they so far lack the capacity to mature wholesome legislation on any subject as to render it necessary to call for the assistance of outsiders to perfect it for them they had better resign and let those come here who have it. I consider the whole protective system as a cunningly devised scheme to rob Peter in order to enrich Paul, and I think the main object of this proposed commission is to convince poor Peter that he is robbed for his own good, and that he ought to feel very happy when he sees Paul growing rich at his expense. Not to put too fine a point on it, in my judgment the sole purpose of the proposed commission is to collate a batch of specious protection sophisms in the form of a 'report,' to be printed at the public expense and circulated by the million through the mail under the frank of members of Congress just in time for the next Presidential campaign; and I think that will be precisely the result should the bill become a law. A very smart trick, well worthy of the sagacity of a set of sharp-sighted patriots who can see a three-cent piece farther with the naked eye than an honest farmer can the full moon through a telescope."

The men who will be on this proposed commission are already in the public mind. They create and subsidize politics. They expect their compensation. All creations of this nature are symbolic, but the creator is greater than the symbols.

> Great are the symbols of being, but that which is symboled is greater;
> Vast the created and beheld, but vaster the inward creator;
> Back of the sound broods the silence, back of the gift stands the giving;
> Back of the hand that receives thrill the sensitive nerves of receiving.

Whose nerves will thrill with the delight of receiving is already fixed by those who support the commission, and whose trades are represented in their petitions for the Eaton bill.

DOWN WITH THE INTERNAL-REVENUE MACHINERY!

I favor openly and boldly the entire abolition of the cumbrous, corrupt, and spying system of the internal revenue. It is not necessary to say that its officers are corrupt; it is the system. Its officers pursue the voter into his cigar and tobacco shops and into stills, breweries, and factories with threats, and it has its army of 5,000. Worse than the janizary or the mameluke, it undertakes by its occult machinery to intimidate and defraud. Away with it! Every speck of it on our body-politic is a cancer. I am willing to meet this issue at the polls, and woe be to that member who upholds it to overfill our Treasury that the greedy may riot in the people's hard-earned means collected by its officials. Indeed it seems a part of the plan adopted by the dominant party to allow no reduction in any shape. The surplus is to be piled up year after year, and this is the issue we are to meet.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] has expended some of that pure elocution with which he graces our fervid hours here upon the "excise system as an infernal one." It is in its details and execution bad enough; but it has the virtue of directness, with all its harshness of espionage and seizure. He quotes with favorable comment the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania years ago [Mr. KELLEY] which passed, 106 to 6, for its abolishment. He places me rightly at that time as an opponent of that attempt. He does me the honor to quote a resolution of mine looking to two objects: first, frugality in expenditure and reduction of taxation; second, the abolishment of the internal-revenue system and the sum required from it to be collected by the States.* I believed in this plan then and I believe in it, somewhat modified, now. It would have worked like a charm. But other counsels were then dominant and are dominant now. Protectionists were not in favor of reducing the taxation by tariff or for the frugalities which I commended; but they were in favor of a hasty riddance of the internal-revenue system. I gladly favor this riddance to-day. Let the additional sum we need for frugal administration, if raised by internal-revenue laws, not only be reduced on many articles and objects, but let it be collected by the customs officers. Why not? If we retain these revenues on tobacco and spirits and let their rates be reduced, the reduction will increase the revenue—which gives 90.6 per cent. of the internal revenue—sufficient for frugality. As in the past so in the future, for when the whisky tax has been raised the revenues have decreased, and vice versa. There was a loss in 1880 of $16,000,000 of revenue by the increase under the rate of 1875 of 90 cents a gallon. A return to the lower tax of 50 cents per gallon would again increase the revenue millions. These facts are authentic. (North American Review of 1881, page 609.) But the Republican caucus has ruled otherwise. The chairman of the Ways and Means [Mr. KELLEY] follows not his own judgment, but the caucus. The issue is made. Let us follow it to the end.

WHY HAS NOT THE TARIFF BEEN REVISED?

The tariff we seek to revise is a monument of war necessity, and of subsequent treachery. It was promised to be reformed after the war when the internal taxes were reduced on home manufactures. The protectionists know that it stands on shaky ground. They would postpone its modification, because one link in the common bond which binds its selfish enactments and mutual aggrandizement once severed the whole chain falls to pieces. Hence they are anxious for changes, but do not want to begin. The commission is a convenient expedient with which to promise and not perform.

The committee which reports this commission measure had promised us, in the words of the member from Kansas, that we would have a tariff bill so as to amend its details. They gave us three little bills, and we allowed them unanimous consent to put them through the House. I shall refer to them hereafter as the sum of the immense deference which this committee has shown to the House.

Nor is it any reason for postponing a revision of the tariff that the Democrats had the power for two Congresses and failed to repeal its war features and restore those of 1846 and 1857, as administered by Robert J. Walker and James Guthrie. For one I am not responsible for this criminal negligence.

In answer to what has been said by gentlemen to-day, and especially by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] I say that I know that less than a score of Democrats united in former Congresses with the entire body of the opposition to prevent a revision of the tariff. His criticism is just on some of our party, but not on all. But I do not make this a party question. To me it is economic only.

I see the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] observing my remarks. He is a business man. He is thereby unfitted for tariff legislation in the general interest, just as a "business" commission would be. I beg to say I learned my political economy in Rhode Island, at Brown University, from Dr. Wayland. He taught me the morality of the question. This I shall never forget in my votes here.

When we attained power in 1875 we found a small free list and a monstrous burden on 2,000 articles made abroad which compete here. It was protection, complicate and tyrannous. Even the flag was made to pay 112, woolens over 80, and cottons from 45 to 71 per cent. Specific duties rendered it still more complex and unequal. It remains a monumental load. It destroyed commerce to build up at its expense manufactures. The consumer was fined to help the maker of unsalable goods. It pirated on farms to help forges. Even General Garfield cried aloud against its commercial despotism, and for liberty to trade more freely, until his voice was stifled in the smoke of torment which came from the furnaces in Northeastern Ohio. Our merchant marine went under the deluge of selfishness and meanness. The millions that sank with it were found in the coffers of the Pennsylvania and their kindred philosophers. My district in New York City, that used to rejoice in ship-building, and when men by the thousand answered the summons of the "old bell," is now deserted. The grass is growing where the boiler-makers worked. The docks and engines of happy labor are pitiable to behold. The tariff has done it all. No relief has come, and our flag is unknown upon the sea. The prophecy of De Tocqueville as to our supremacy on the ocean, it is now laughable and lamentable to read.* What excuse is given for this condition of things? Wages! Wages! Let me answer this fallacy of wages.

WAGES QUESTION.

The assertion that protection makes wages high is probably the most potent defense which protectionists at this time possess. It appeals, and very properly, to the bread-and-butter instincts of the masses. It lays hold of the generous impulses of the well-to-do. The aim professed to be achieved by protection, high wages, is indeed so absolutely desirable that the wonderful thing is not that the masses wish to support the system which promises such a result, but rather that anybody can be made to believe that tariff reformers or free-traders want to make wages low, yet multitudes do beleive it. Why, else, such floods of eloquence in the halls of Congress to demonstrate the desirability of good pay to the toilers? Why, else, such ponderous enginery of logic to prove that starvation among the workers is not an element of national prosperity? Multitudes do believe it. They accept without a shade of incredulity the stupid assertion that there are men in this country actually roaming at large who wish to reduce our wage-earning citizens to the condition of slaves of the soil.

Free-traders do not want to reduce anything, excepting taxation, scarcity, and hardship. They are in favor of high wages, as everybody is. The difference is, that the free-traders maintain that wages will reach their highest under liberty. Why not? Why should not every man, being free, use his energy in his own way? Why should he not select the most fruitful fields whereon to use the most efficient methods, and to exchange the products of his energy wherever he can get the most for them? The protectionist claims to make wages high by artificial contrivances and restrictions, by turning industry in this direction or in that, according to the mere plans of a council of philosophers who undertake to run the machinery of civilization.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken of the proposition, "protection makes wages high," as an "assertion." It is an assertion purely; and it is a most preposterous assertion. So utterly bare of argument is this favorite postulate that the moment you attempt to combat it with argument the protectionist stops his ears, shuts his eyes, and opens his mouth to shout "Theory!" Logic is "theory;" reason is "theory;" to think at all is to theorize, when the question "Does protection raise wages?" is propounded. The protectionist solemnly appeals to "facts," and the "facts" put forward are unauthentic, unverified, undigested statements, which, even were they as true as truth, could not possibly prove anything at all.

The usual thing is an elaborately constructed table—figures arranged in symmetric columns; for do they not carry an air of authority? Are they not wonderfully effective even with those who do not read them? The usual thing, I observe, is an elaborate table, professedly comparing wages in England and the United States. It exhibits a low scale of wages for England and a high scale for the United States. And thus runs the wonderful syllogisms:

1. Major premise: England has free trade. Minor premise: England has low wages. Conclusion: Free trade produces low wages.

2. Major premise: The United States has protection. Minor premise: The United States has high wages. Conclusion: Protection produces high wages. [Laughter.]

Really, Mr. Speaker, this sort of logic is very easy. There is no end to the propositions we might prove. Thus:

3. Major: England has a queen. Minor: England has low wages. Conclusion: Queens make wages low. [Laughter.]

4. Major: The United States is infested with snakes. Minor: The United States has high wages. Conclusion: Snakes make wages high. [Laughter.]

"But this is nonsense!" says the protectionist. "Exactly so," responds the free-trader; "as pure nonsense as the stock protection

*The following is Mr. COX's resolution:

Whereas the Government of the United States was established by the people for their own protection and benefit, and should be administered upon the strictest principles of frugality and economy in its expenditures, and that no money should be taken from the people by taxation, except to supply the necessary wants of the Government administered upon such principles; and whereas, at the present time the ordinary expenditures of the Government, exclusive of the payment of the interest on the public debt and a reasonable sum to be applied in the reduction of said debt, should not exceed the sum of $100,000,000 annually; and whereas the money annually raised by taxation upon the people should not exceed the sum of $250,000,000, said sum being amply sufficient to provide for the ordinary expenditures of the Government, the payment of the interest of the public debt, and $25,000,000 to be applied in liquidating the principal of said debt; and whereas it is believed that the existing internal-revenue system should be abolished, and the sum deemed proper to be raised by internal taxation assigned in just quotas or proportions to the several States to be collected by the authorities thereof and paid into the national Treasury, thereby dispensing with the expensive, corrupting, and annoying machinery now in force for that purpose, &c.

*From the Bay of Fundy to the Gulf of Mexico the coast of the United States extends for nearly nine hundred leagues. These shores form a single, uninterrupted line; they are all under the same rule. There is no nation in the world which can offer to commerce ports with greater depth, greater width, and greater safety. * * * Europe is, then, the market of America, as America is the market of Europe; and maritime trade is as necessary to the inhabitants of the United States, to bring their agricultural produce to our ports, as to take our manufactures to them. The Anglo-Americans have at all times shown a decided taste for the sea. Their independence in breaking the commercial links which bound them to England gave a new and powerful impulse to their maritime genius. Since that time the number of the ships belonging to the Union has increased nearly as fast as the number of its inhabitants. At this day it is the Americans themselves who carry to their homes nine-tenths of the imports from Europe. It is the Americans, too, who carry to the consumers of Europe three-quarters of the exports of the New World. The ships of the United States fill the ports of Havre and Liverpool. One sees but few English or French ships in the port of New York. Thus, not only does the American merchant brave competition on his own soil; he competes successfully with foreigners on theirs. * * * I think that nations, like men, almost always show from their youth the powerful features of their destiny. When I see the spirit with which Anglo-Americans carry on trade, the facilities they possess for doing it, the success which they attain in it, I cannot help believing that they will one day become the first maritime power of the globe. They are impelled to take possession of the sea as the Romans were to conquer the world.—De Tocqueville's Democracy, 1835, volume 2, chapter 10.

The ships of the United States are not one-fourth, or, if steam is taken into account, not one-seventh of those of England! And while American ships carry less than one-fifth of the whole trade of the United States, British ships carry much more than one-half of that trade!

argument about wages." The thing you pretend to do is to prove that the alleged low wages of England result from free trade, and you simply assert it. You are asked to prove that the high wages which exist in the United States are the result of protection, and again you simply assert that such is the case. Why do you not carry out your pretense of reasoning? Of all the advanced countries of Europe England pays the highest wages. Wages are higher in England than in France; higher in France than in Germany. Why do you not treat your followers to this sort of argument:

In England, free trade and high wages. In France, protection and low wages. Therefore: Free trade makes wages high, and protection makes wages low.

What country in the world has more protection from the outer barbarian than China? If protection can make wages high, the Celestials should be Vanderbilts and Astors. Why do not our friends "appeal to facts" in this direction, and blazon the results before "free-trade fanatics" and their deluded followers?

Do I, therefore, maintain that comparison of facts is meaningless? Not at all. I say only, first get your facts; and secondly, put them fairly on grounds of comparison.

Everybody admits that this country is prosperous. Every American glories in the fact. But when the protectionist calmly ascribes our magnificent progress to his patent process of invisible taxation some of us object. Has the fertility of our soil done nothing? Has the wealth of our mines gone for naught? Does the cunning skill of our artisans count for nothing in industrial development? Has American genius in mechanical invention been spent in fruitless vagaries? What an insult to American brains and American brawn these pretenses of protection really are. "Protection did it all! Were it not for protection we would have been hewers of wood and drawers of water!" Does anybody believe it? No one even dreams of stating it in plain words. The protectionist seems not to have the wit to turn his stock propositions over and see that in reversed terms they make just this preposterous assertion.

I would suggest to protectionists who are fond of comparisons that they compare the condition of the working-people in England under protection and under free trade, or in America under a low tariff and under a high tariff. As to what they would find in England, the facts are too well known to need citation. The corn-laws were abolished because the working people were reduced to the verge of revolution. The tearing down of the entire fabric of tariff protection was followed by such a sudden and tremendous rise of industrial prosperity as the world has never seen. The truth is so notorious that protectionists, compelled to admit it, actually strive to drum it into service on their side of the question. "Yes," they say, "free trade is the true system. But you must lead the way up to it by a system of protection. That is what England did. It carried out protection for centuries, and then cunningly adopted free trade and swept the world!" As if one should point now to the growing prosperity of the South and say, "Slavery did it. The institution of slavery was maintained for generations, and then, all things being ready, the change was made to freedom, and behold the result!" Protectionists, I say, are compelled to acknowledge that prosperity has followed free trade in England. How could they do otherwise?

Between 1805 and 1825, while England was yet under the protective policy applied to the uttermost, her exports rose from $190,000,000 to $194,000,000—a gain of only $4,000,000; or about $200,000 per annum.

Between 1825 and 1842, under a tariff somewhat reduced, the rise was from $194,000,000 to $237,000,000; gain per annum, $2,400,000; rate of increase, twelve times as great as before.

Between 1842 and 1846, a period of partial free trade, the increase of exports was $52,000,000; rate of increase sixty times as great as under the system of ultra protection, five times as great as under the reduced tariff.

From 1846 to 1876, a straight free-trade period, the exports rose from $289,000,000 to $1,000,000,000, showing an annual gain of $33,700,000; rate of increase, three times as great as under partial free trade, twelve times as great as under moderate protection, and a hundred and sixty times as great as under stringent protection.

The workingmen necessarily, as these facts show, shared in the wonderful progress; wages doubled in forty years; crime diminished, pauperism was checked, the scale of comfort among the masses was raised, and the savings of the people increased in the banks.

What as to the United States? Few in this Hall would have the hardihood to quote rosy Presidential messages as proof of prevailing prosperity at any particular period. These are favored sources of evidence among protectionists at large, but I doubt if any man who has seen public service will put a very high value, as proof, on the rosy pictures drawn by his most gracious excellency of the condition of the country during his administration. I would as soon think of quoting a Centennial or Paris exposition report of merit, or a speech by an obsequious Commissioner of Agriculture!

We want something more reliable than partisan sketches. The census valuations of property, with all their imperfections, are in the true line; and these show, in round numbers, that during ten years of low tariff, from 1850 to 1860, the wealth of the country increased from $7,000,000,000 to $16,000,000,000, while from 1860 to 1880, twenty years of high tariff, the rise was only from $16,000,000,000 to $35,000,000,000. In other words, under low tariff property doubled in ten years; under high tariff it took twenty years to double.

Again, take the test of population. For convenience I put this in form of a table:

Table showing increase of population by decades, with nature of tariffs in force.

Years.	Tariff.	Increase of population.
		Per ct.
1790–1800	Revenue	35
1800–1810	Revenue	36
1810–1820	Revenue for six years	33
	Protective for four years
1820–1830	Protective	33
1830–1840	Protective for three years	34
	Compromise for seven years
1840–1850	Protective for six years	34
	Revenue for four years
1850–1860	Revenue	35½
1860–1870	Protective	22
1870–1880	Protective	29

In every case, the injection of the protective element repressed the growth of population. And the growth of population is acknowledged to be one of the surest indices of the condition of the great mass of the people. But there is stronger evidence in existence than inferences from general conditions. In 1842 inquiry was made among manufacturers as to wages paid in the iron industries. A protectionist Congress wanted the information, and hoped for support from the facts. But if you will consult Saltonstall's Report, March, 1842, you will see that the manufacturers, with everything to induce them to strain a point if possible to make out a case of high wages, responded that the rates paid were about the same as in 1828.

No increase of wages in fourteen years! And what of these fourteen years? Were they fourteen years of low tariff? Fourteen years of tariff for revenue only? Fourteen years of "British free trade?" No. On the contrary, the stiffest protective tariff we have ever had was passed in 1828, and had been in operation from that time!

In 1845, we had a Secretary of the Treasury who was not infatuated with Chinese economy, and he instituted inquiries as to the effect produced on wages by the protective tariff of 1842. Did the protected manufacturers leap to this opportunity of revealing themselves as the benefactors of the workingman? Not at all. They went into the sulks. They regarded such investigation as impertinent. It needed no answer to show the truth that wages had actually gone down. Of all the responses given none declared any advance in pay, and some who gave the highest rates on the list admitted that reductions had been forced upon them.

From 1850 on, we have the census exhibits of wages to guide us. What story do they tell?

In 1850, the average of wages paid per year was $248. After ten years of low tariff the average had risen to $290, an increase of about 20 per cent. Then came ten years of protection, and the paper rate of wages was $377 for which the gold equivalent was about $250, a decline under protection of more than 13 per cent; bringing wages to just about the point at which they were left by a "tariff for revenue" twenty years before.

The statistics for 1880 are not yet compiled, but if the indications of the advanced bulletins are sustained, protection had better speedily change its tactics—forswear "facts" and once more, as of old, turn its attention to theory.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to get down to the A B C of this question of wages. The assertion is that protective tariffs make wages high.

What is a "protective tariff?"

It is a system of import taxes, so laid as to prevent or restrict the importation of certain commodities. The direct object is to keep out foreign goods, or to handicap them in the market by adding the amount of the duty to their natural cost. The ultimate aim is to cut down competition and enable the home manufacturer to put higher prices on his wares than he could get under a free system.

This "protection" to the manufacturer, it is claimed, is necessary to his existence—he could not make his iron, his cottons, his woolens without it. I do not admit this as a fact. On the contrary I deny it most emphatically. But thus runs the protectionist plea; the American manufacturer must have this privilege of extorting more than the market rate for his goods, or he will not be able to continue in business.

Let us have no muddling of facts here. The manufacture for which protection is demanded is prevented as being naturally a losing business; that is, taking materials as they are, taking capital and brains as they are, taking wages as they are, taking prices as they are, the American cannot make and sell the goods at a profit. The cost of manufacture is too great. He must have protection. For what? With most consummate audacity the protectionist tells us "to increase wages." That is, to make the cost of manufacture greater still! Can any one be deceived by such hollow pretenses? Obviously he needs protection, if he needs it at all, in order that he may cover the loss which his methods of manufacture entail. He must make good the margin between the natural selling price and the advanced price which he needs to bring him out whole. That is all there is in protection, excepting always the robberies for which the system is so good a cover.

I do not say that the protectionist might not add something for the workingman when he arranges for a tribute from consumers for his own benefit. Indeed, such benevolence would seem the most natural thing in the world, since the credit would redound to the protected manufacturer while the cost of it would be laid upon the people. I contend only that it requires a great stretch of even American credulity to imagine a Pennsylvania iron-master deliberately adding to the difficulties of his contest with British competitors. But let us grant, for the sake of argument, that the manufacturer, finding it impossible to do business at a profit, does actually petition Congress for means not to relieve himself but to increase the cost of his operations. Let us suppose that the protective tributes go to the workingmen engaged in the protected manfactures, how many workingmen are there who receive the benefit?

The census of 1870 divides the working population of the country as follows:

	Per ct.
Agriculture	47
Professional and personal services	22
Trade and transportation	9
Manufacturing, mechanical, and mining industries	22

The division of the tribute will obviously be confined to the latter class. So that, at the first examination, we find that the proposition "protection increases wages" must at least be denied as regards four-fifths of the working population.

One man in five probably has an increase of wages, under the theory we are considering. But investigate further. The class of manufacturing, mechanical, and mining industries includes a host of arts not touched by the tariff, except to burden them by additions to the cost of their materials and tools. Blacksmiths, carpenters, engineers, masons, milliners, painters, plumbers, printers, and so on through the alphabet, where is the protection for these? Not a thing they make is protected, nor could be protected; yet all their tools and all their materials are weighted with taxes for the benefit of the protected few.

Again, there are scores of mechanical arts nominally protected, but really beyond protection. Who speaks of protection to American sewing-machines? American clocks? American tools? American wagons?

If reckoning be made among all these, and the workingmen counted out from the general class under consideration, we shall find the 22 per cent. dwindle to something like 5 per cent. We must seek among this 5 per cent. of the working people of America for those whose wages, on our supposition, may possibly be advanced. That is to say, under the protection theory we are discussing, the employers of 5 per cent. of our workmen are enabled by the tariff to pay better wages than the market rate—if they choose to do so.

Now, I wish to offer here a curious bit of figuring. Suppose that this reasoning from protection premises is correct, and that the 5 per cent. of our workingmen do actually get the higher wages. The number of our working population to-day is not far from 15,000,000. Five per cent. of these gives us 750,000. Now, the lowest estimate I have ever been able to make of the total tax paid by consumers on protected goods is $750,000,000 per annum. But $750,000,000 among 750,000 men would be just $1,000 apiece. Whence it would appear that we might just as well have free trade and pay the "protected" workingmen $1,000 a year for remaining idle!

SILK.

The protectionist is fond of scoffing at such general illustrations as being woven of airy nothings. Let me call their attention to something more specific in the same line. I have before me the preliminary report (Census Bulletin No. 69) on the silk manufactures of the United States. It is prepared under direction of the manufacturers themselves. The total product of silk manufactures for 1880 is put at $34,410,463. Silk is protected by 60 per cent. duties. Taking the protective element in the total product at no more than 50 per cent., we have $11,000,000 as the price which we pay annually "to make wages high" in silk factories. But what was the total amount of wages paid in 1880 by these silk factories? The report gives it $9,107,835. So, then, had we bought our silks abroad in 1880, we might have supported all the silk operatives in idleness, and had $2,000,000 left to apply to the fund for the relief of indigent manufacturers.

This being the state of things, one might naturally infer that the wages paid to silk operatives were noble wages indeed! The shows ing of the Bulletin, however, is that the average number of hand-employed was 31,299; so that when you divide up among them this wage fund of $9,107,835, you give them only $290 apiece. Two hundred and ninety dollars a year! It is to give our skilled artisans these princely wages that we shield them from the pauper labor of Europe.

Returning from this digression: only 5 per cent. of our working people, as I have shown, can possibly gain any increase of wages from the protective system, for the very good reason that only 5 per cent. are engaged in those industries which share in the protective offerings.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BREWER] has made a speech which does him credit for research. He gives us the facts of the specialty he represents—silk. They are interesting, and his speech is the best one that can be made upon the fallacy he defends. He leaps into the arena here for the first time, and bears the laurels in this losing cause. He seems to say to us:

> Consider me, if you can,
> A matter-of-fact young man;
> An alphabetical, arithmetical,
> Every-day young man.

But does he give any reason why we should think the silk employés shared the increase our bounty gives?

Now, what reason is there for believing that even these workmen received any increase? Do employers fix the rate of wages on benevolent impulse? or is it fixed for them by the conditions of the labor market? Supposing that the silk manufacturers of Paterson were able to pay their operatives $10 per day; does any one dream they would do it? If the market rate were $1 a day they would pay the dollar and shake hands with each other over the $9 as profit. They would probably use some of it to go on to Washington and petition for more protection.

It is the unprotected industries whose steadiness of profits and products enables them to pay the best and steadiest wages. When we tax expenses and not income, it is the workingman who suffers, not capitalists.

In short, the protected industries, like all other industries, take the rate of wages as they find it, and the rate obviously cannot be fixed by a demand which covers only 5 per cent. of the field. Wages are made high in this country by the 95 per cent. demand—by the unprotected grain of the West, the unprotected cotton of the South; by the wonderful bounty of nature to this fruitful land, and by the intelligent brains and cunning hands of all our people.

WAGES AND PRICES—MASSACHUSETTS FIGURES.

No more reliable report of the welfare of our workingmen can be found than that given in the statistics of labor of Massachusetts by its chief, Carroll D. Wright. The volume for 1882 is just out. In considering the relative ease with which the workingmen of that State procure the means of subsistence and the relative amount of comfort attainable for a given outlay of time and effort, the chief has given us reliable statistics of wages and cost of living. No economic discussion is complete without considering these data and their comparisons from year to year. Accordingly in the tables presented (pages 420 et seq.) the average weekly wage of 1881 is compared with 1860, 1872, and 1878; and on page 429 the prices of commodities of these years are given; on page 430 the purchase power of money.

I have left the volume at my room; and cannot read from it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have it here for my colleague.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think, under the general rule, I may print enough of the extracts. The advance on groceries, provisions, fuel, rents, and board is given, boots only falling 1.6 per cent.; but the average increase of these elements of living was 21.2 per cent. But the table on wages shows an average increase of only 6.9 per cent. below that of the cost of living. In boots and shoes, cabinet-making, carpetings, carriages, rubber and straw goods, there is a positive decrease. The economist may make his inference. If the tariff does affect wages, it is to depress. As to the comparison between the same classes of labor in Old England and New England, the report makes it clear that in spite of our rich products of provisions, &c., excepting vegetables, there is no inference in favor of a protective tariff.

Here and now I deny and defy the accuracy of the figures produced here as to wages here and abroad. I wrote to Mr. Nimmo, the Commissioner of Statistics. He asserts that no comparisons are of such value as to be used here with the confidence gentlemen use such tabulation.

Wages are the laborer's scale of comfort. That is, or ought to be, axiomatic. They are criteria depending on the varying costliness of the articles which the laborer consumes. Wages may be low nominally and yet high really; and vice versa. If with all a man earns, like the weaver at Cohoes, who works thirteen hours, he cannot buy the necessaries, the wages are not a criterion of comfort.

Wages are said to be 50 per cent. greater here than in Great Britain. This is a mistake. From 1815 to 1875 wages in Great Britain in many trades were higher than here. Immigration actually went home. When we have higher wages they are accounted for on other grounds. Our natural advantages and ingenious machinery and skill beget high wages. They always did from the first. The wages depend on the product. In farming we pay higher wages than formerly, and yet we outsell foreigners in their own market. The average annual wages of men, women, and children employed in manufactories in 1850, as taken from the United States census just after taxation was reduced on the necessaries of life, was $247.37; average annual wages in 1860, after fourteen years of a low tariff for revenue, $289.02; increase of $42.65. Average annual wages in gold in 1870, after ten years of a high tariff, $283.23; decrease, $5.79. Difference in favor of the lower tariff, $48.44. Protectionists say that wages are higher here than in Europe. So they are now, but in 1875 they were lower. Many skilled mechanics went back to England and Scotland then. The tariff was nearly the same. But the high tariff raises the price of everything workingmen have to buy. Beef cost in 1860, 10 cents; now, 16. Mutton then, 8 to 10; now, 9 to 14. Corned beef then, 8; now, 11. Bacon then, 10; now, 13. Lard then, 12; now, 15. The same is true of rent, clothing, and all the necessaries of life.

Let us compare the wages paid in the cotton industries of the two countries; which comparison, as given by Consul Shaw, is as follows: English weavers are paid from $3.85 to $8.64 per week; Massachusetts weavers from $4.82 to $8.37; English spinners, $7.20 to $8.40; American, $7.07 to $10.30. In the Lancashire mills, for January, 1881, the average wages of men were $8 per week; of women, $3.40 to $4.30; in the Massachusetts mills, men $8.30, women $5.62; the hours of work per week are, in Lancashire fifty-six, in Massachusetts sixty.

It is claimed that the labor market in Massachusetts was glutted when these figures were taken, while in England there was a scarcity of labor, owing to immigration to the United States. Still, giving the protectionists the benefit of this statement, and it will be seen that the condition of the English artisan is much more favorable, at least so far as the cotton industry is concerned, than that of the American, for the reason that in England house-rent and clothing are from 50 to 100 per cent. cheaper than in the United States, while the difference in the prices of provisions is almost nominal, on account of the strength of American competition and the construction of through lines of traffic between the two countries.

As to wages, I know that they constitute but a small part of the value of the finished product. In most, iron, cotton, and wool products, they are not in excess of 20 per cent.; and allowing 50 per cent. difference in wages at home and abroad 10 per cent. would be ample protection on the wages score for most articles. I favor therefore an amendment: that in any adjustment of duties proposed with a view of compensating the American producer for any difference in the cost of labor in favor of the foreign producer no rate of duty shall be recommended in excess of 50 per cent. of the entire value of the labor directly entering into the market value of any article, and the standard for estimating the value of such labor product shall be the average wages paid for its production in the country that is the chief source of foreign supply for the competitive import.

I do not know that I make it quite clear, but I think gentlemen will see the point. If we must consider wages at this time, it is best to know what shall be the standard for estimating and compensating for differences in the cost of labor. Shall it be Chinese or Russian, French or English? Let us not fall into a trap by not knowing how small a proportion of the value of any finished product of large consumption is directly represented by labor's wages.

Moreover, I would instruct the commission that all things which are not made by any process of skill or handicraft, and that need only to be gathered, or transported to be used for manufacturing, and are the gifts of nature, shall be free. So long as we tax such things the cost or necessity of protection cannot be measured. Neither can any judgment be formed of the conditions when protection will be a necessity. We must, in other words, if we are to have intelligent protection—I use the words as seriously as I can—have some basis.

Again, as the manufacturer of chemical preparations does not depend so much upon the skill of artisans as upon favorable supply of materials, the limit of duties on such should be uniformly low, not over 10 per cent. But if a system based on any such fundamentals should be reported, Congress would break in on it by a combination of interests in respect to particular products. So really the only way to go to work is as we did in 1872, namely, to take articles up one by one and have the duties cut down, as on copper, coal, salt, wool, Bessemer steel, &c. Some free-traders think that tariff reform would be promoted by our failure to do anything. Experience has not yet been severe enough to make the interest in reform very general or ardent. It will be more imperative a year from now than at present. A sweeping deduction of 10 per cent. as proposed by my friend from Illinois, Mr. MORRISON, on all the tariff taxes and a greater reduction of articles to be taxed and reduced rates on internal taxes and the abolition of its costly machinery would, in my judgment, be a good thing to do just now for a beginning, in default of anything else.

STRIKES.

If protection is making the workingmen so very content with high wages, how does it happen that now, with a tariff averaging over 40 per cent., there is so much discontent with wages, lack of employment, and strikes? Why are the "unions" drawing their well-ordered organizations closer in the bonds of honest sympathy against their despoilers? Almost every art and trade from one end of the land to the other is in distress. They cannot make a living, much less lay up anything for a rainy day or the schooling of their children. They know when it pinches if they do not always know what pinches. They are told it is a corner in provisions. Our legislation ought not to leave them at the mercy of grain-sharks. It may be the increased cost of provisions, clothing, and rent. These are enhanced by combinations of moneyed men, corporate harpies, who can show them fifty millions cash in or out of a corner, men who prey upon the people in rates of transportation and through watered stock and in escaping that taxation which they foist on the shoulders of labor, the source of all wealth.

MONOPOLIES.

Do you not see that this tariff, which hangs as an incubus on labor in country and city, is one of the monopolies by shameless legislation, by purchased and interested nabobs? What have you done to lighten the labors of the poor? You would keep up a great surplus by continued taxation. You make provisions dear by making transportation dear, by Bessemer steals. You would perpetuate the mean little taxes on matches and checks and keep it uneconomically high on spirits and beer, by the aid of a pestilent internal system of spies and informers. You are safe while your commission sits, for your exactions continue. You fail to give relief as to the hours of labor or by removing the competition of striped scoundrels in the penitentiary. You force them into "unions," and then, with pretexts of mob and violence, with bayonet and bullet, drive them into desperation. You have legalized oil companies in a gigantic form of greed to grease the wheels of liveried coaches. You would take river fronts in great cities to increase your corporate gains. You create great overland routes and allow them to be gutted, watered, and handled so as to defy and defraud the Government which gave them land and bonds. You make them the supple instruments of heavy interest and a privileged, expensive, political banking system; you have done it by your votes; and when the devil you have harbored turns and rends in its desperation, you stand here and ask for a commission to report to you, at the end of two years or more, some plan of relief, which will be when reported seven other devils of despair. The men who raise your products, make your cloths, roll your iron, and build your houses are entitled to a fair share of the inheritance of the earth and the blessings of government. They will have their inheritance or know "the reason why." [Cheers.]

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE COMMISSION.

This tariff commission will result in nothing. There will be no agreement if the two sides are represented; and if one side only, it will be partial about any important matter. And Congress at last will simply have to inquire anew for itself.

Now, as to instructions. They will be ruled as not in order to the pending bill, except in so far as they instruct the commission. I suppose as this is not a "revenue measure," so called, the point of order on all amendments directing the Committee on Ways and Means to report a tariff measure, or in any way changing or revising it, will be ruled out. Not being able to vote for any amendment dealing in the rise and fall of wages, and taking my ideas from Silas Wright and Robert J. Walker, the great economists of 1846, I cannot vote for the unequal system of specific duties unless they be discreetly arranged so as to protect the poor man.

SPECIFIC DUTIES.

As to the specific duties I care not on what basis of valuation or what average, they have no charm for me. What! tax the poor man's tea the same per pound as the rich man's tea, which costs double the price! Have a fixed average of three years on the cotton or wool of the poor man's clothing, irrespective of its ad valorem! Even Horace Greeley denied the equity of such specifics. There are cases where specifics are useful, but the value is best, as Robert J. Walker held. Let me quote from him as to the general and specific effect of the present tariff:

> We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly four thousand articles as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretenses. It yields a dwindling not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufactures at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture, an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

In 1880, at Cincinnati, the Democracy reaffirmed all the specifications of 1876. They are for revenue only. Upon this, whether my party fail or not, I stand.

Let not Democrats or Republicans here be misled by "business men" as to the specific system. Rather let us declare with Robert J. Walker that—

> There is another insuperable objection to the specific system, namely, that it unnecessarily and invariably taxes labor vastly more than capital, and the poor in a much greater proportion than the rich, upon the goods consumed. Under the system of specific duties of so much per pound, or yard, or gallon, &c., the specific duty is the same. The rich, who purchase the costly article bearing only the same specific duty, pay, in proportion to value, less than one-half what is paid by the poor, who purchase a cheaper and less costly article. If we take all the costly articles purchased by the rich bearing under the present tariff the same specific duty as the inferior article bought by the poor, we will find the difference against them exceeds $20,000,000 a year. Such is the immense additional tax exacted from labor under the system of specific duties.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] roundly and soundly characterized the injustice of the specific system in answer to the author of the Morrill bill. Let me quote:

> Perhaps the Senator is proud of the fact that he has invented a system under which the laboring-man pays 90 per cent. tariff tax on the only kind of blankets he can afford to buy, while he and his lordly friends pay less than 60 per cent. tax on such as they use, and in like proportion for all else. How long would a law stand in the State of New York that taxes the residence of Mr. Vanderbilt or Mr. Stewart, worth $2,000,000, no more than the residence of their coachman, worth $2,000? That is specific taxation. Ad valorem, or a fair per cent. tax on each according to its value, is the system adopted by the American people in all their State governmental affairs, and is the only just system. Mr. Walker but expresses the views of all disinterested intelligent men when he says:
> "Our present system of taxation is the most onerous ever imposed upon any people, and is utterly destructive of the prosperity of our country.

"Our present tariff is also most unequal, oppressive, and unjust. It is grievously onerous upon agriculture, commerce, navigation, ship-building, &c. * * * The present tariff, besides the tax of $150,000,000 a year upon imports, the duties on which are paid by the people into the Treasury in gold, exacts another tax of at least $350,000,000 a year in the enhanced prices of rival protected domestic articles. This can be readily proved by comparing the prices current in gold of such domestic articles with the prices of similar articles produced in other countries."

Already have I ciphered here the excesses of the tariff when gold was at a high premium, and when a thousand millions represented moneys of the people which never saw the Treasury, but went into the pockets of the subsidized, bounty-fed paupers. The methods by which my result was attained are of record. They have never been answered, and cannot be answered.

I have learned from Judge Montgomery Blair that the tariff of 1846 was the product of the brain of our great and popular New York statesman, Silas Wright. He has left a proud record for human freedom in other regards; but I desire now to quote from the letter of Robert J. Walker, of the 30th of November, 1867, vindicating the tariff of 1846. Upon his platform we may stand to-day. We need no more revenue than he estimated. We should derive it from the sources he indicated. Here is his programme:

This revenue of $244,000,000 a year, as a maximum, I would derive from three sources alone:

1. By a tariff for revenue.
2. By an excise on wines, malt and spirituous liquors, and tobacco; abolishing all other internal taxation.
3. By a tax on our national banks, based upon just and fair equivalents.

* * * * * * * *

A tariff for revenue, as experience has shown, instead of depressing improves all industrial pursuits, including manufactures, and vastly augments the wealth of the country. Under the tariff of 1846, as shown by the census, our wealth increased, from 1850 to 1860, 126.45 per cent.; whereas from 1840 to 1850 the increase was only 64 per cent.; from 1830 to 1840, 42 per cent., and from 1820 to 1830, 41 per cent. So, also, from 1850 to 1860 our agricultural products increased 95 per cent. and our manufactures 87 per cent., being in both cases nearly double any preceding ratio of increase. So, also, our exports, imports, and revenue nearly tripled in the same period of time, and our domestic trade rose nearly in the same ratio. This augmented ratio is not the result of increase of population, which from 1850 to 1860 was less than 36 per cent. The Irish famine was supposed by my opponents to account for the increase the first year, although the decreased price paid abroad that year for our cotton nearly equaled the additional sum paid by England for our breadstuffs and provisions. But the next year and the next, before any gold had reached here from California, our exports and revenue went on augmenting in a corresponding ratio, rising in eight years from $22,000,000 under the tariff of 1842 to $64,000,000 under the tariff of 1846.

PREJUDICES AS TO FREE TRADE.

The first prejudice to be overcome is that so often answered. It is verbal. It relates to the phrase "free trade." "God save us!" said an eminent man, "from the evil spirit and from metaphors!" It is idle to explain that freedom and trade in themselves, together or separately, are not obnoxious to any one. No one champions slavery and isolation. Free-traders have but one object: to be rid of that state of affairs which forbids nations to exchange with each other their various products, untrammeled by hostile and prohibitory tariffs. Free trade would remove hinderances. It would do it, while affording proper support, by customs dues, to the Government. All agree that if free trade were universal it would confer great blessings on mankind. It is therefore worth approximating to it, if we cannot reach it. Our trade is only free as to exports; on our imports the exactions are laid, and as a consequence their prices are raised. If, as I claim, free trade thus considered would achieve the greatest production at the least cost, who ought to complain? France, Germany, Russia, and the United States are the victims of the opposite idea, with what results as to population and wealth in comparison with Great Britain the statistics amply demonstrate. Free trade enables a country to obtain commodities which it cannot produce at all, or at a disadvantage. It is the most productive employment of the forces of the world. It would have every country produce that which will bring the greatest quantity of commodities. The amount of our losses by protection is to be measured by the excess of the price at which commodities are produced over that at which they can be imported. This can be proved by bills of lading and the expenses and percentages until the consumer receives the article, through many media, from the producer abroad.

GRADES OF OPINION.

There are three classes of opinion here:

1. Those who are for bounties outright and are bold enough to say it. These are high protectionists.

2. Those who would regulate wages and relieve in part, by certain amendments on raw materials. Those are protectionists of the same idea, but of a timid quality.

3. Those who stand by the constitutional and economical idea of raising revenue, and revenue only.

Those who are of the latter class are popular champions, and have the courage of their opinions. They neither duck down to the clamor of the interested nor violate the rules of constitutional interpretation. They believe that this Congress has nothing to do with regulating wages or prices. Wages and labor are in the market, to be had under the inexorable law of supply and demand, and those who tinker with them generally do it to harm labor. They have no business to bring the shop into Congress.

RAW MATERIAL.

The argument for free raw material is valid; and if good, is good for the manufactured article. Besides, sir, who is to judge of what is raw and what not? The argument of Hamilton that no duty should be laid on the materials of a manufacture——

Mr. McLANE. You do not mean Hamilton. He was not——

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes; I will put it right, in print, if not now.

Mr. CARLISLE. You are right.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes. Hamilton even intended to help one class of manufacturers, the maker of raw materials, to the discomfort of another. Is salt raw? Yes, in one sense. It enters into manufacture. It is the chief material of alkali, and alkali of glass. Is leather raw? If not, what are boots and shoes? What is the test? The labor employed? There may be more labor in getting coal, or in growing wool, than is required to turn the raw into the manufactured article. Perhaps, a farm-house is raw, the tools of trade, the clocks, and the human machine which requires caloric as much as an engine. It is hard to tell what is raw and what product. Bastiat happily hits the fallacy (chapter 16) as to the admission of the raw and keeping out the manufactured product. The illusions which he dispels on this topic are worth perusal.

So, in regard to American ores—their miners demand equivalent protection, if the manufacturers are cared for. It is complained that they cannot compete with the Irish, Spanish, and African ores, owing to cost of labor, which are transported for a nominal freight, if not as mere ballast. The very mining is at stake.

Out of these interferences between grades of labor springs a healthy conflict out of which the body of the people, the consumers, may get their dues from Government.

It touches wool. "Why," says Colorado and Vermont, "why let in the raw wool? Is it not prohibited by the tariff of 1868? Is it not a product of our grazing factory? Our money is invested." Just so, the early cotton raisers demanded a tariff on its importation. How can they compete against foreign raw cotton? "True, the cotton-pod suited our natural elements of growth, and the cotton-gin came along to help, and we undersell the world." This argument is as good for protection on the raw material as on its product, but no better. "Tax our manufacturers more, our raw material less, and thus," exclaims the mild protectionist, "we will prosper." "No," exclaims the bounty-fed gorged manufacturer, "tax all out; and our millenium is nigh."

If the duty on the manufactured product reduces the price, as some one here argued, why not keep the duty also on the raw material? It is vice versa.

There are men here who are not mealy-mouthed protectionists. I see one who believes and is not afraid to say that the tariff is to be made as a bounty. So much cash subsidies drawn from sweating toil should be handed over to certain persons engaged in certain manufactures. These are the highway robbers, unmasked, the Jesse Jameses, who give out false lights, stop or wreck the train, and boldly go through the passengers. They are honored when shot, buried in the sweet consolations of religion amid admiring friends, while the sneak-thieves generally receive the loathing even of their pals in crime. Nor do I see any prospect of permanent relief in the plan proposed by my colleague. His is a sort of compromise. All compromises on this topic will fail. Natural laws and liberty fight against them. It is no mere fatuity or fancy that the stream of freedom will cease to flow on because a few clever business men are shivering on the bank, wondering whether to plunge in, or to put on their clothes again and hurry homeward.

I join with all in the attempt to relieve raw materials; but let us not forget the product. I should be glad to vote in the direction of freedom, even if limited. It would be a great relief; but if it stops there it might as well never have begun, for its modicum of relief only adds clamps to the system of protection. Especially anxious to get at the details of the tariff, I disfavor all attempts to be partial in the final relief which justice and equity demand. Nor can I ever cast a vote for the inequity of the specific duty. I stand on the ground of 1846 as it was laid down by Robert J. Walker, already cited, and so ably defended by Mr. Senator BECK.

I agree with gentlemen that we have no more right to let in scrap-iron or foreign ores than the rails or other manufactured product; and I demand as much freedom for one as the other. It smacks a little of partiality in piling up taxes on the foreign manufacture and relieving the raw material. If there be any principle in the resolutions of my colleague, I would be glad to find it. Certainly my colleague is not a protectionist in the intense sense. He would have an adequate revenue, on the average of years, to give all the protection needed. What is that protection he demands? Rates sufficient to compensate for the difference in the wages of labor here and abroad. He would have an "equivalent compensation in the form of protective duties or of a bounty from the public Treasury."

But I do not criticise my colleague, [Mr. HEWITT.] He has had enough of that from the out-and-out bounty-men. It is to his credit that they attack him. The clubs under his tree show the sweetness of the fruitage which he would bring to the liberties of interchange. Let us welcome him, going out even half way to his succor. Like David A. Wells and others, who were protectionists of the old school, when the impulse and momentum, with these attacks, grow under the incentive of his generous nature, he will lead us to those quiet pastures by the still waters which he pictures as the finality of the free trade doctrine

RECIPROCAL BRIGANDAGE.

Only one advantage we have now—debate. We cannot amend the pending bill so as to revise the tariff in any particular. I need not say, Mr. Chairman, that I am an advocate of the thorough revision of the tariff. I have fought that fight here under worse auspices than now. I would not temporize with middlemen, straddling men, or "business" men.

This is my thesis: no more revenue than is needed for frugal administration and to pay the interest on our debt. No branch of industry protected at the expense of others.

The incidental protectionist is an incidental bounty beggar. If the incident is good so is the principal. An apple is still an apple, though called a russet apple. If a rogue steals my watch and chain it is called robbery. The watch is the principal thing; it keeps time. The chain is only an incident; it is ornamental property. How can one be virtuous incidentally? He who is for "revenue only" is opposed to stealing generally. He is therefore on my platform, and with those incidentally off that platform I have nothing in common on this topic; no more than with the principal brigand.

I have heard it argued here by a gentleman whose views are against protection that he would vote for it because he would make reprisals. He would have a bounty for his local occupations because others were grabbing from him, and he must get even. I have seen even Kentucky just have a little temptation to get even with Michigan on copper, protected 45 per cent. Kentucky wants cheaper copper for her Bourbon stills, and gets back one-half in a bounty on hemp, foreign grass, jute, of over 20 per cent. Maine is content to allow her old ship-yards to go to grass, for her lumber is protected over 17 per cent. Massachusetts groans for cheap Nova Scotia coal, which Pennsylvania denies; but she makes up for the loss of the caloric for her mills in other ways. She wants a market against protective Canada, but is content with a steal on dress goods, worsted, &c., of 60 or 70 per cent., and on cottons of every kind of make-up of from 35 to 58 per cent. Louisiana, not without reluctance, rolls a sweet morsel under tongue with the 50 per cent. and more. [Laughter.]

But we must allow North Carolina something on pea-nuts [laughter] and Connecticut 35 per cent. on corsets and hair-pins! Pennsylvania, ever dear and expensive, makes coal. Out of coal she gets a quarter of a dollar protection out of every dollar imported. In fact, she allows no coal to come in except a half million worth. Science has drawn out of the coal-tar exquisite aniline colors for dresses and ribbons to decorate the beautiful women of my Congressional district. [Laughter.] They might be called "blooms of carbon!" [Laughter.] Upon these raw materials thus manufactured she gets a duty of 68.48 per cent., so mixed, specific and ad valorem, as to stick worse than the original tar! If Massachusetts growls at this, Pennsylvania feeds the industrious infant on a fish diet of sardines at 45 per cent. Wheeling and Pittsburgh are unhappy because their glass is not protected enough. They get 110 on a certain size of plate glass and from 32 to 80 on other kinds; but still they see through a glass darkly, till California and Illinois come along to fill it with high spirits, running up on the scale of patriotic fuddlement as high as 325 per cent. [Laughter.] Tin is a product that ought to be as cheap as sugar or potatoes or salt; but tin-men complain of the tariff as hurting them on the "raw." Carpets—ah! was there ever so grand a larceny? From 50 to 75 yards are taken at the custom-house for every 100 brought in, and all that might come and does not has its effect to aggrandize the robbery. We know who gets these bonuses.

When it comes to this reciprocal bounty, there is a loving kindness between adverse interests. It is so charming. It reminds one of the song in Mascotte. The shepherd swain sings to his Phyllis, "More than turkeys I love you." [Laughter.] She responds, "More than sheep I you love." [Laughter.] And one sings, "Gobble, gobble, gobble!" [Laughter.] And the other responds, "Bah-h!" And the country echoes "Gobble!" and "Bah!" and they silently steal away. [Great laughter.]

In many instances these reciprocities of larceny are wanting. The nickel is limited, like the copper, to one man or a firm, and silk to a Jersey city. Bessemer is held by a few persons, like paper pulp; and the codfish by a limited class, which does not even allow a hog to come in and be cured with free salt, and only protects the latter 14.1 per cent. on his bristles. [Laughter.] A man is shaking with the chills out on the Maumee, or in Egypt, Illinois—I observe my good friend [Mr. TOWNSHEND] shaking now [laughter]—when lo! a firm in Philadelphia is caught stealing about four pills in ten of the man's quinine. [Laughter.] The firm was not compelled to disgorge; but it was caught and told not to do it again, or do it so as not to be caught flagrantly doing it. That was well; but it is only one of hundreds of articles in these tariffs in which the larceny is both mutual and continued.

BUY, IF YOU WOULD SELL.

But, Mr. Chairman, when you answer the various fallacies of protection, including the wages sophism, the protectionist shifts his ground. He says: "Oh, wages are a reason, but not the reason for protection. Hamilton, Carey, Greeley, and others placed it upon surer foundations, namely, protection promotes more association among our people, develops home trade, creates more interdependence, and gives greater variety to employment." This fallacy has been exploded a thousand times. I do not believe in the idea of making a tariff to affect wages. The tariff has reference to our trade abroad as well as at home. The great grievance is that we are giving foreigners the pretext to cut us off from selling to them. Our pork is diseased, our breadstuffs too cheap, our manufactures too ingenious, or some other pretext will be made to kill the trade which brings to us foreign gold. Sir, to sell, you must buy. I have argued that barter is the only continuous and prosperous kind of exchange.

Buy, if you would sell. Thus Great Britain grows great in tonnage and commerce. In ten years up to 1879 she increased her tonnage by 7,000,000, and we lost 140,000 tons. As to commerce, where is ours as an exporting nation? Twenty-four millions of dollars against Great Britain's four hundred million. Even at our doors in North and South America they undersell us. Why? Because she does not burden her commerce with exactions.

Our adversities in commerce and navigation make it imperative that we should look abroad for our trade. That trade must be barter. If we sell our surplus abroad, we must, in the end, to keep the market, buy. This is the principle of political economy laid down by John Stuart Mill. (Cap. 21, Principles of Pol. Econ.)

It is undeniable that without imports there can be no exports, and vice versa. There is no economy in exporting as much as we can and bringing nothing back except money. Trade will cease if there be not real compensation. There must be two parties to be benefited, otherwise trade will die.

Antagonism when aroused leads to retaliation. It is stronger than self-interest. "You are getting it all; we so little in return. We will punish you. If you are not prohibited altogether, you shall be restricted." It is the substance of Canning's dispatch, which is the spite of one who deems himself unfairly treated:

> In matters of commerce, the fault of the Dutch
> Is giving too little and asking too much;
> With equal advantage the French are content—
> So we'll clap on Dutch bottoms twenty per cent.

[Applause and laughter.]

The argument that we must look only to a home market has also been answered a thousand times. It presupposes free trade limited—limited among the States. It forgets that what is good among the States is good among the nations. If it be an economic argument, irrespective of patriotic self-sacrifice, this would be valid as a reason. But if good between Ohio and New York, Texas and Missouri, why not between Canada and the United States, Mexico and the United States? There should be no limitation except for revenue. Judge Douglas once favored a Zollverein of American nations for this purpose. I have proposed that the congress of such nations, including the Dominion, which the President may call, should consider this unity of our general interests in this hemisphere.

OBSTRUCT ALL TRADE!

This idea of obstructing and fettering trade was properly illustrated by my colleague from the saline district of New York, [Mr. HISCOCK.] In a short response to an argument for removing impediments to our commerce he stated with boldness and perspicuity of view, and in a comprehensive, calm, and philosophic manner, his idea of a tariff. No raw material disturbed the lofty serenity of his economic thought. He would obstruct in order to protect. Let me quote his remarks. On the 5th of March, 1882, (RECORD No. 57, page 5,) my colleague is reported to have said that "all the burdens that are imposed upon the importations to this country were in the direction of protecting the industries of the United States;" and referring to the burdens of the consular-system, he said its cost was "precisely of the same character of protection with the imposts that we lay upon those goods."

Should not this precious statesmanship be preserved. Let me help it to some illustrations. The first that occurs to me is that used by the countryman of Adam Smith, [Senator BECK.] My colleague may not see its pungency. When the Ohio River freezes up there is a coal famine in Cincinnati and prices go up, and the coal-fields of Western Virginia, Ohio, and Pennsylvania rise in price. This is an obstruction to trade; and my colleague, if he had lived in Cincinnati, as I have, during a winter, would appreciate the value of uninterrupted trade, but if he were a coal merchant or proprietor he would not. By parity of reasoning he would oppose the good appropriation bills for rivers and harbors, while he would favor the bad, since the good removes obstructions and the bad destroys navigation, yet we do not find him making discriminations.

The protectionist would tear down our colleges, because the teachers cannot in teaching ethics fail to teach the liberalities and not the slavery of interchange. He would destroy the inductive philosophy, which Bacon originated and Newton and Farraday and Adam Smith practiced, because it holds that an aggregation of facts enables reason to generalize. Does not free trade poison the fountains of knowledge? He would bury the dead Latin of Bacon's inductive philosophy, whose translation is that there is nothing practical unless theoretical; because he would not have the facts except in mangled disjecta membra, scattered and incongruous fragments, with no philosophy as the "theory."

He should rejoice in the snags of the Missouri, the crevasses of Louisiana, tear away the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi, and glory in the overflow of that Father of Waters; but he does not, because his heart relents when he sees human suffering and scarcity, though on the tariff he would obstruct commerce. In one case he is a philanthropist; in the other, an economist. By the same process of reasoning, he would have our phosphates turned over to foreigners; for would it not obstruct vegetable growth; our forests burned; would it not make shelter more costly; our mines flooded and spoiled; would it not make less easy and more costly to obtain the tools of trade and the needs of life? Would he not make the sky brass, and close the windows of heaven that crops should fail; for is not abundance the cause of woe? Would he not rob his own loved Onondaga wells of their 64 per cent. on salt in bulk by obscuring the sun, which evaporates their waters, and allow the pork of Cincinnati equally with the codfish of New England to have salt free from abroad?

The theory of my colleague is that of obstruction, scarcity, monopoly. When we theorize upon a basis of facts, they say: "Oh, your theories are beautiful and true; they are fine; fit for commonwealths of angels, but not for practical society. It is the same old nonsense." So said my friend from Michigan, [Mr. HORR;] but I ask him, is it old or new nonsense which says that the same protection puts oats up and salt down at the same time? When we thus theorize, they call it the same old "nonsense." To be sure, we must repeat; we can not with every morn vary the multiplication table, or change the precession of the equinoxes. There is an order and a law in nature supreme. If we say two and two are four, it is the same old nonsense; we ought to call the result seven. It would be so novel and striking. We say abundance is a blessing and scarcity a curse; it is old nonsense, as old as the famine of Egypt. We ought to say that famine makes scarcity, and scarcity, high prices, and that plenty begets cheapness, and low prices are detrimental to industry.

INSECTIVOROUS ANNOYANCES.

Protection is insectivorous. It feeds on the larger body. It is parasitic. It was said by Professor Riley, a naturalist of the Smithsonian, in a humorous illustration, that there are birds of ill omen who tear holes in cows and sheep and deposit their eggs therein. These hatch out lizards. They fatten on the animal just as protectionists fatten on agriculture. But the animal does not die at once. The lizards in time are driven off the body and buried in the ground and come forth again in the form of birds like their parents. It is the analogue of protection. It may not kill, owing to the native strength of the cow or sheep, but it is very troublesome. [Laughter.]

This clamor of protection is a croak; it is not a rational speech. It began after developing its infantile ways as a tadpole in search for worms and insects. It grew so in damp weather, in the land, that people thought it rained frogs. After a surfeit, the infant began to appear in public as a leader of fashion; he works out of his old skin deftly and swallows it, then he begins to croak again at the satisfaction of consuming a part of himself. [Laughter.]

LITERATURE AND POTATOES.

Let me instance some of the objects to be secured at once without a commission. Take newspapers, periodicals, and magazines. The removal of the duty will increase the revenue. The duty now is $30,000 per year, while it costs the Government $38,000 per year to carry that portion which comes in free of duty by mail. The postal treaty estops the compensation. The leap from periodicals to potatoes is quite a long one, but the tariff bridges the abyss. There is quite an importation of German cabbages and Irish potatoes going on. It is part of the paternal care of the Government. The quotations at Boston when I saw them last month were for wholesale of the principal kinds; the retail quotations being 20 to 30 per cent. higher than the wholesale: Early Rose and Prolifics, $1.10 to $1.15; Chenangoes and Jacksons, 90 to 95 cents; imported Irish potatoes, 85 to 90 cents—all per bushel of 60 pounds each. But for Ireland what chance would there be for a poor man to indulge in the luxury of potatoes? The crop in this country is entirely inadequate to the demand, and this has been the situation for some years past. The great bulk of potatoes received at Boston, New York, and Baltimore are imported from the British maritime provinces, and yet our Government continues to exact 15 cents per bushel on every bushel so imported, and this on a prime necessity.

CONDENSED MILK.

A company proposes to make condensed milk; they find that they can make it here better and cheaper than in Switzerland. Why do they not? The condensed milk contains about 32 per cent. of its weight of pure sugar; the tariff adds 4 cents a pound to this sugar; the tin-plate tariff comes in to burden the cans, and the natural advantages exhale! This is the system which the Agricultural Bureau heralds as "firmly fixed" on the American Government.

COPPER RING.

A copper ring, with nickel and lead, made a tariff raid. They got enough to make the trade nearly prohibitory. Copper keeps up the price 15 per cent. above the English price. They have a surplus which they send off to cheap markets, and take a bond of the purchaser for its consumption in Europe. Somebody here is hurt, the cartridge-maker perhaps most; but one copper company, on a capital of $2,000,000, declares 80 per cent. dividend. You want this fact to go to a commission, and a commission made up of infants and paupers who cry out for more.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a question?

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir; my time is limited. I draw the line of prohibition on you.

Mr. KELLEY. I only wanted to say that the last Democratic Committee on Ways and Means could not dispose of the single subject of sugar alone during the whole Congress.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is speaking; but I do not value his remarks specifically. [Laughter.] In fact he is prohibited. [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. He is smuggling.

Mr. COX, of New York. He is an instance of all high tariffs. It leads to smuggling, even in debate. [Laughter.] The gentleman's policy taxes little children, babies even.

Mr. KELLEY. Not yours. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I have no doubt somebody has lost something by the fact of my not being perpetuated; but before I call attention to these taxes on the babies, I desire to say that if I had a child and he did not oppose these high-tariff bounties I would disown him. [Laughter.]

TAX ON CHILDREN, MENAGERIES, ETC.

The little girl cannot play with her doll, nor the boy whiz his top, nor the mother wash her offspring with soap, except at an expense of from one-third to one-half of their cost for the domestic privilege. [Laughter.] If the mother gives her child castor-oil she pours down 148 per cent. ad valorem, [laughter;] if the child does not enjoy the dose, there is a 25 per cent. bowl as the recipient of the contents of its tender stomach. And though she "wash it with niter and take to it much soap, yet the iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord," for the soap is taxed 40 per centum! God help the child!

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How about candy?

Mr. COX, of New York. I am coming to that in a moment, my honey. [Great laughter.]

If she wraps the little dear in a plain bleached cotton night-shirt, it has a nightmare of 5½ cents per square yard specific, [laughter;] when the child awakes in the morning fretful, she combs its little head at 35 cents ad valorem, [laughter;] if she would amuse it, she rolls it over a Brussels carpet at 90 cents per square yard, or gives it confectionery made of refined sugar at 4 cents a pound tax, and 25 per cent. ad valorem; if it tears its little panties, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] sews them up with spool-thread taxed at three-quarters of its value. [Laughter.] Why, if she used a shingle to bring the little "toddling wee thing" to its senses, as the honorable gentlemen can recall, the cost would be enhanced at the rate of 17 per cent. taxation. [Laughter.]

If the youngster has a patriotic inclination on our Fourth of July, his fire-crackers are taxed as a patriotic luxury at $1 extra a box, and the bunting which furnishes the flag, though but 23 cents a pound, costs 121 per cent. extra, while the band plays on instruments taxed at 30 cents. She takes him to the menagerie to study natural history. There is the zebra, symbolic of a mixed ad valorem and specific, [laughter,] and the stately giraffe, high protection, [laughter,] the royal tiger, and unicorn of Holy Writ at 20 per cent. And the procession of elephants! Every one 20 per cent. True, Jumbo, for purposes not to be mentioned, is excluded by the affidavit of a consistent protectionist! but the log-chain that holds his huge legs binds the monster in protective chains! [Laughter.]

WHAT RELIEF HAVE WE HAD?

From these insectivorous exactions some attempt has been made here as a remedy. The remedy is almost laughable, when the quantity of the insects is considered. We have had free-trade reports on little matters from these protectionists on the Ways and Means. The relief was almost an infliction—it was so small. But we have borne them. Our consolation is that which Pope found, when he said of the English in their regard for the colonies: "We can always bear the afflictions of others with Christian fortitude." Yes the principle of free trade was established by these very few bills on small subjects.

> Think naught a trifle, though it small appear,
> Small sands the mountain, moments make the year,
> And trifles life.

CHEAP CLOTHING.

In the RECORD, No. 26, page 2, it appears that the gentleman from Kansas reported a bill to make free of duty clothing from abroad for colored people. This was done out of charity. It was a good object. I endeavored to extend its blessings and to cover white persons. It gave no revenue and no protection. It was entirely free trade, and it is a monument to the principle.

BIBLES FREE.

It appears also that my eloquent friend from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER,] in No. 47, page 26, sought to refund the duties on 2,100 copies of the revised Bible. His fine classical speech is a tribute to our principle, but it is partial.

Why not as well discriminate in favor of one book of the New Testament of one revision as another? Why not let in Luke free since he employs the purest Greek, and place Matthew, Mark, and Paul at 20 per cent., since their dialect is more Hebraic? Why disallow the original papyrus copies from coming in free along with the glue by which the pulp of the papyrus plant, after being rolled into paper, is stuck together. Besides there are apocryphal books; let this commission decide about them. Let them ascertain to a certainty whether Paul wrote the epistle to the Hebrews. Some commissioner in the Bessemer steel business might inform this vulgar, heathenish Congress on that head. If we are to have discrimination in this reform, some commissioner in the printing-paper business should point out whether the uncial or cursive characters are the fountains of the version. Then what will the commission, unless we have a theologian on it, do with the palimpsests? These are scratched sheets, which have been restored. Will they be taxed? They are now free. What inquiry will they make as to the authenticity of the old codices out of which the revision is drawn? As a Representative of a Catholic constituency I want to know if His Grace Cardinal McCloskey could not be on the commission, since we have favored the Protestant revision, and keep the tax on the Douay edition, the English standard in the Catholic Church, from which it is drawn. Give me leave also to have my old college mate, Dr. Fisher, of Yale, associated with his grace, that Saint Jerome and his vulgate may not fall under the ban, so that we may discreetly inquire whether the Latin editions made by the great Dalmatian should be specific per page or ad valorem. What, sir, as to Luther's edition of 1522? Why should King James's edition be taxed? It has already gone through a commission of scholars. Macaulay calls it a stupendous work, which, if everything else in our language should perish, would suffice to show the whole extent of its beauty and power. Even the skeptical Huxley could not admire it enough. You allow the correction of its 120,000 defects to come in free; but the great original cannot come. I believe this House has allowed a Chinese Bible to come in free. Is that so?

A MEMBER. Yes; that's so.

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, then, even the Chinese edition of the Bible has been made free by our protective Congress; but other tea-box literature with Chinese is cumbered. [Laughter.] I think I can hear the learned discussion of our commission on this biblical tariff. They must renew the terrible philomachy of the learned doctor's question: Was it a dish or a charger, namely, a war-horse, on which the damsel brought in the head of John the Baptist? This is mooted. My friend from Georgia favors the dish. The gallant gentleman from the blue-grass country would naturally favor the horse. Is the unicorn a wild ox or a rhinoceros? This should be referred to Forepaugh or Barnum, on the commission. Were the men that were cast into the fiery furnace in their coats, their hosen, their hats, or in their trowsers, their tunics and their mantles? This is a hefty theological disputation. Is it demon, satan, or devil?

Mr. MORRISON. They leave Hell out of the revised Bible and let it in. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes. They are not partial to Hell; else why raise the question, Is it Hades or Hell? [Laughter.]

But I forbear—the Committee on Ways and Means might give us a bill settling these questionable points, so as to educe from their quiet repose the scholars of this House, and not leave these questions to the mongers in iron and the owners of spindles.

PAPER AND PULP.

What a solemn farce, this freeing of a certain Bible, when we tax paper and to make knowledge dear. Besides, we neutralize all the natural advantages of a protection on paper-making by other burdens; 60 per cent. on felt; 48 on the copper-wire cloth; 16 per cent. on soda-ash, and from 30 to 60 per cent. on coloring materials, and keep out crude fibers of wood to help a paper-pulp monopoly, one of whose advocates finds my generous arguments too much for him, because too general.

WILD-ANIMAL TAX.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY]—Where is he? He seems to have left. [Laughter.] I want to show that he is an incidental free-trader. He will not deny that on occasions he has reported bills to allow animals to come in free. True they were for a show, or, as he advised me, to teach zoology. But he is none the less a free-trader, but he does not go far enough. The tax on the noble king of beasts is 20 per cent., and it is the same on the anthropoid. Why not discriminate in favor of the bear against the lion, for, as the song says:

> The bear he never can prevail
> To lion it, for want of tail.

The editor of the New York Times was shocked at my playful remarks when the bill came up about free clothing for poor blacks. He disliked any humor on these topics; but I have here his editorial arguing that bears are chargeable with 20 per cent. because composed of grease; or perhaps 10 per cent., because "unspecified grease," and "hair unmanufactured." When he saw, however, that "lead in pigs and bars" was 2 cents a pound he was disposed to increase the duty. He wants to know whether foreign bears on the vine-clad hills of France have not had lead put into them? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] would free bears and load down "pigs," and both for Pennsylvania, because pigs are iron in Pennsylvania and animals elsewhere. [Laughter.]

When I asked the gentleman why he granted this limited relief he said it was to teach natural history. This is a confession that the present tariff on wild animals is a burden on zoological knowledge.

It is a tax on zoology. If it were a fair tariff it should tax all animals which enter our ports; not merely man with the iron in his blood, but the monkey from which he is said to be derived. It should not merely tax the cattle and sheep of foreign meadows, whose fat and lean are made by that cheap labor called the sun, but the fishes which swim in the waters, whether canned like sardines in a box or casked like whales in their blubber. There is difficulty in drawing the line in the animal kingdom. We call some animals vegetables, because built up by organic food, like the Venus's flytrap, which lives on the fly; or whether with sensation and voluntary motion they consume oxygen and give off carbonic acid. Mushrooms sometimes exhale carbonic acid instead of consuming it. Let the mushroom be taxed as a warning to scientists. Besides, should there not be a tax levied proportionate to their digestive, absorbent, circulating, respiratory, and especially the excretory systems? Why not tax a mollusk as well as a vertebrate? You tax the brain product, books, revised editions of the Book, why not tax the brain itself according to its value? Why not tax the ulna and phalanges? You tax phosphates. The body is full of them. So of carbonates, sulphates, and chlorates of soda and oil. Let them all be taxed, if any.

If Jumbo can come in free for breeding purposes, let his incident be taxed, ivory and his trunk be examined by vigilant custom-house officers. Or let him be referred to a commission; they will then have two elephants on their hands. One elephant at a time is enough for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] introduced to the last Congress a joint resolution to refund to the society of the Sons of St. George, Philadelphia, $1,440.25 in gold, being the amount paid upon the colossal statue of St. George and the Dragon. (H. R. No. 151, second session Forty-fifth Congress.) He had already freed from the tariff cage all wild animals when imported by zoological societies. What did this tribute to free trade signify? Who is this patron saint of England, always associated with the dragon, whose image is to be admitted free into this country? Well, he is a saint, and about as much of a saint as the present English rulers who capture and detain our citizens. He began his career about the fourth century, in Cilicia. I had the pleasure of seeing his birthplace. It is said that he was a parasite in his early career of so mean a type that he would sell himself for a cake. He became a contractor to supply bacon to the troops, and cheated the government and barely escaped death. He was a high protectionist and favored native industry in Egypt. [Laughter.] When in Egypt, he embraced Christianity and became a Greek bishop. His pliancy gave him power and he began persecution against the Trinitarians. He raised a rebellion and had to leave, but was allowed to return to Egypt, where he showed himself very cruel. He was finally dragged out of prison and torn to pieces and his remains burned. His admission to this country with his effigy of the dragon is a pretty contribution to free trade under the auspices of protection. It looks as if Philadelphia were corrupted by British gold. [Laughter.]

BIG BURDENS—COTTON-TIES.

While they were about it, relieving wild animals and mythic dragons, and revisions of the Bible, why did they not relieve on larger matters? Let me illustrate the greed of overprotected manufacturers and their supreme indifference to the rights of others and that general good which they profess. This illustration concerns our great product of cotton. Few facts are more strongly in point than the recent repeated assaults on the Treasury Department to extort a high-tariff ruling in regard to cotton-ties. What is the iron cotton-tie? It is a recent invention. It is a strap of hoop-iron, provided with a sort of buckle. It has many advantages over the old-fashioned rope used in baling cotton. When the existing tariff was enacted this tie had no existence. It had not yet been invented. The tariff could not and did not provide for it, excepting under that convenient clause and cloak—"not otherwise provided for."

The cotton-tie was obviously a manufacture of iron not otherwise provided for. As such its legal rating for duty was clearly 35 per cent. ad valorem. But at first it was rated as hoop-iron, 1½ cents per pound, equivalent to about 70 per cent. ad valorem. It continued to be so rated until some inquisitive person, doubtless urged by bribes of "British gold," made the discovery that a manufactured article invented twenty years after the tariff was framed must be an article "not otherwise provided for;" and the Treasury Department treacherously sustained this un-American view. The tax was reduced to 35 per cent. This was the signal for a conflict. That conflict still rages. The manufacturers rush to Washington. They clamor for help. They propose a bill for the infant. They have been protected a hundred years on the plea of being aided in infancy. They must have pap—pap—pap. They cannot yet make a simple iron strap without a protection of 35 per cent. ad valorem! What did I say—35 per cent.? They demand 70 per cent.! They have 35, yet they languish under it, or pretend to. "A tax of 35 per cent. is not enough for our necessities; give us the privilege of screwing 70 per cent. from the planters on our goods or we shall perish!"

In their pleadings before the Secretary of the Treasury these infants of tender years find a guardian ad litem in my friend from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY.] They pray for a mere bagatelle in the way of a bonus. Said one of them: "A decision in favor of the manufacturers would make a difference of perhaps ten or twelve cents per bale of cotton to the planter." Ten or twelve cents a bale! What a pitiful matter to refuse! Where is the boasted large-heartedness of the Southern planter that he haggles over a pittance like this!

Unfortunately, however, the Southern planter ciphers on a slate. He is as deft as the Yankee manufacturer. The cotton crop now runs to 6,000,000 bales. Ten cents a bale is $600,000. The little trifle, then, which the manufacturers want over what the tariff now gives them is $600,000 a year. The whole tax which they ask the Southern planter to bear on the single item of cotton-ties is twice that sum, or $1,200,000 annually. This impudence deserves monumental bronze. It is none the less brazen when applied to farmers as well as planters.

ARE FARMERS INTERESTED?

You give the farmer a little douceur on his oats, but you tax his trace-chains nearly 60 per cent. The elegant gentleman shines in his carbonic gem at only 10 per cent; but the vast repertory of carbon which God has pressed out of vegetable nature into coal through the cycles of time is taxed at 60 per cent. for caloric to run the mill and warm the shivering. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] stands up here arrayed in rubies and pearls, at 10 per cent., but his carpenter constituent pays on an average 50 per cent on his saws.

Mr. CHACE. I trust the gentleman will allow me a word just here. Those saws to which he refers sell for less money in this country than they sell for in any other country on this earth.

Mr. COX, of New York. Take the tariff off and see how much less they will sell for.

Mr. CHACE. The Disstons export them to all parts of the world, and they are sold as cheap here as they are in Great Britain.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then why do you want a tariff?

Mr. CHACE. If you had been here yesterday and heard my speech you would have heard why.

Mr. COX, of New York. Thank you. I will read it; it will be one of my surprises hereafter. [Laughter.]

I meant to ask why the worker on "Providence Plantations" is to be charged, in addition to the tax on his tools, 58 per cent. for sitting down on a carpet-tack. [Laughter.] Oh, yes! you give the farmer of Maine, who raises potatoes, his 15 cents a bushel to come out of the poor man of my city; but you tax his plow and shovel 45 per cent.

"Every product of the farm is protected," sings a sweet chorus here. Such a chorus reminds me of the verse as to the frogs:

> Sons of the swamp, with lungs of leather,
> Let us raise one voice together!

[Laughter.]

One member picks out oats, another grain, another, of a gentle turn, sheep; another, of a ruder type, hogs; and so they say that the farmers are protected, and that, too, with their great crops and big surplus, the price regulated by the foreign demand for the surplus and the independence of the farmer assured by the demand! Farms protected! Why, if there be anything that neither has, nor asks for Government aid in the way of bounty, it is the farming product. There is a perpetual vendue for him at home and abroad. Look at his list. Take the typical American wools, the great staples of beef, pork, corn and wheat, butter and cheese, cotton and hay, lard and tallow, fruits and vegetables fresh and canned. Who asks to protect petroleum, turpentine, rosin, ordinary hardware and agricultural implements, coarse cottons, starch, and scores of other articles, which, if the tariff were off, would not be increased in importation, and which, if we had free trade, would seek foreign markets?

If the market for agricultural products have not had a better market under protection than under a revenue tariff the question is settled. For twenty years the farmers who produce the great bulk of our product have waited for a better home market. Have they had it? In 1860 our agricultural exports were $295,000,000, or 78.81 per cent. of the whole amount; in 1870 they were $391,000,000, or 79 per cent. of the whole amount; in 1880 they were $685,867,000, or 83¼ per cent. of the whole amount; in 1881 they were $730,000,000, or 83 per cent. of the entire exports. To secure this home market—home market—they paid at least 25 per cent. more for domestic goods than they would have paid but for protection. On five billions' worth of goods $1,125,000,000 more have been paid than they could have been imported for, and all for the home market. To secure this home market the little surplus of $730,000,000 was foreign export. It requires much patience to argue this over and over again.

It is enough to make every pig on every farm grunt in derision; every bull in every pasture bellow in laughter! [Laughter.] A protective tariff to prevent Canada and France competing with us in bread and meat-stuffs! Hah! hah! he! he! ho! roars out universal nature! No wonder the Mississippi lost its channel at the ridiculous suggestion. Old ocean, bearing on its bosom to the needy of Europe our immense surplus of the farm, from the cheese and apples of New York to the cotton and corn of the South and West, thundered its ironic fun at the ridiculous suggestion!

Farming in New England and New York does not pay? Who asks to protect them against the rich soil of the West? Their farms are in some places deserted, and what is cultivated is running into larger farms; but the little tub thrown to the whale is in the shape of protection against foreign potatoes and Canada grain. The idea! It would make Adam Smith or even Horace Greeley turn over and laugh in their graves.

GREATER REVENUE BY LESS RATE.

Gentlemen may think that the larger the duty, and the larger the catalogue of duties, the more the revenue. No more puerile statement was ever made. In 1880 your tax on tannic acid, 196 per cent., gave $693 revenue; on your tax on chloroform, 119 per cent., we get $638; chicory is 102 per cent. and yields $7,352 revenue; out of acetate of soda, 222 per cent., we get $20; and how many scores of articles from which you get nothing as revenue, even at lower rates than these. A certain article is used for painting—whiting and Paris white; it is taxed 240 per cent., out of the importation of which we raised $18,000 revenue, and to it we add, as protection, the heavy freight. It will be found no insect of a tax. It annoys, but it burdens as well.

The history of the repeal of the English tariffs will illustrate the increase of the revenue by the reduction of rates and articles.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Chairman, I have come to this debate with no very sanguine hope. The commission bill will pass. We are speaking at a funeral, but it is a funeral which suggests the resurrection and the hope of liberty. A good crop abroad, a poor crop here, will startle the farmer and planter into heedful thought. Our prosperity and the influx of gold as a consequence of our good crops and their profitable outlet have made the people believe that we are doing well because of our tariff. We have done well in spite of it. We have met the reform of the tariff with bated breath, like the man in the fable who prayed to Jupiter. He was advised not to pray so loud, for Jupiter might hear him. Now, we have gained courage by the voice of the people. The selfish legislation of man cannot always defeat natural laws or the dispensations of God. I will not indulge in Utopian dreams of a near future of unfettered liberty to trade. The intense material and greedy system will take time for its uprooting. But the time has come when even Republicans in this House and old-time Democrats, too, who, forgetting for a season the beneficent tariff of 1846 and 1857, championed protection, are coming within the fold. They come cautiously; they find irrational pretexts; they argue about compensating tariffs to arrange wages, but they are coming. Once seeing the light, even though it but glimmer, they will be leaders in that principle which would augment the common stock of human blessing to the detriment of none. At this moment a brave statesman of Spain, Sagasta, with the aid of liberty-loving Castelar, is endeavoring, against open revolt in Catalonia by the misguided protectionists of the manufacturing regions to proclaim liberty of trade so as to better the condition of the Peninsula. He will enforce it; and we stand in this boasted land of liberty clamoring for more bounties to the favored and gorged few. America, sir, may yet pioneer the way among the nations in the cultivation and elevation of science, art, manufactures, taste, and amenities which are the result of that intellectual and moral condition that flows from unrestricted interchange, when the differences of soil, climate, production, and society will be so far obliterated that the human race will be advanced in its spiritual and loftier aspirations.

This progress commands the inner and solemn agencies that mark our own race, land, and era. The pauseless energy of steam and the fleet forces of lightning are harnessed for the triumph of liberty—liberty to the plow, the loom, and sail—liberty to dispose of one's labor, the precious pearls of which upon the brow of this century are set as crown jewels of democratic-republican exaltation of individual and national life.

Is it not time for the toilers of our time, so fruitful in progressive thought, to recognize the idea that the greatest economy and morality is to be found in freedom? If, sir, to conserve law with liberty burdens must be laid upon labor, then, let it be remembered, when we create taxes and tariffs, that

> All that freedom's highest aim can reach,
> Is but to lay proportionate loads on each.

[Applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KENNA. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York, then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.]

Mr. FLOWER. Mr. Chairman, to my mind there is something incongruous and almost ridiculous in the long and wordy discussion we have passed through in order to determine whether we shall create a commission to discuss our ways and means of raising revenue before we revise them, or shall both discuss and revise them ourselves. Now, there is to me no excuse for either the discussion or the bill. We are peculiarly situated as to our financial necessities, and as far as I can judge we are aware of our situation. Our wants are of two kinds, or rather, we need money for two purposes: first, to support the Government, and second, to pay our debt. To the end that we may meet these wants we employ two means, the one tariff, the other internal taxation, and it appears that these taxes are not only producing sufficient revenue to meet the requirements of our debt and the Government expenditures, but that they far exceed all legitimate expenditures, and consequently are so far unauthorized and illegal.

Our interest-bearing debt amounts to the sum of $1,500,000,000, of which $511,000,000 are now payable, $250,000,000 falling due in 1891, and the remainder in 1907. From now to 1907 we can only pay $761,000,000 of debt, or less than $30,000,000 per annum for the twenty-six years. We are now paying at the rate of over $150,000,000 per annum, and unless our taxes are reduced we will soon be compelled to pay even more. To me, as a business man, the proceeding is absurd. No one feels more than I do that it is incumbent on this nation to meet its obligations promptly. No one knows better than I know that it is the duty of this House to provide for the nation's solvency. I believe in paying the debt as fast as it is due, but I have no hesitancy in saying that it would be folly to pay debts at 16 to 21 per cent. premium before they are due; no fear of contradiction in denying our right to collect more than can be legitimately expended.

We can only use seven hundred and sixty-one millions of surplus in paying our debt for the next twenty-six years. At the present rate of taxation we will be forced to buy and pay off our bonds before they are due, that is, while they are at a premium, or to let the wealth we are drawing from the people accumulate in the Treasury to the demoralization of enterprise, and as an inducement to lavish expenditure. When I say that our surplus of revenue over expenditure is over one hundred and fifty millions per annum, and that for the next twenty-six years we need less than thirty millions per annum to satisfy our creditors, I am reluctant to think any one will desire further explanation to understand our position. Over and above the necessities and extravagances of the Government, over and above interest on our debt and the requirements of the sinking funds, over and above the amount we ought to pay to our creditors, we are collecting from the people one hundred and twenty millions annually, grinding them unnecessarily, piling up in our vaults each day one-third of a million more than the Government, lavish as it is, can spend.

This ought not to continue; it has lasted too long already. The country and this Congress recognize the fact that there is an evident need of immediate legislation to reduce our income to its proper proportions. There cannot be immediate reduction; that would be disastrous to vested interests; but when the people are being unnecessarily mulcted of a million every three days there is no excuse for procrastination in the arrangement of the preliminaries to their relief. But what are we doing to relieve our people from this crying evil? What measures are on foot for its dislodgment from our body-politic? Nothing; none.

The Committee on Ways and Means come to us with a bill repealing twenty-three millions of our internal revenue, and another relegating the revision of the chief sources of our revenue to a commission; proposing procrastination where it is neither advisable nor admissible; advocating delay where it is plainly their province to formulate measures of relief. With the groans of an overburdened nation assailing our ears simultaneously with the propositions of Treasury robbers, with the cries of those who are assessed alternating with information as to how our overflowing vaults can be depleted, with innumerable bills and petitions for a reduction of taxation, we are, forsooth, informed that it will be well to abolish a few minor stamp taxes and let the rest of the matter be decided upon by some nominees of the Executive.

Whatever the committee may think, I am unable to reach such a conclusion. I believe that prudence and justice to our constituents call upon us for some more effective policy and more sweeping reductions. The twenty-three millions of the committee is not equal to one year's increase from internal taxes. It is a mere pluck at a leaf of a weed which should be pulled up by the roots. Except as regards distilled spirits and the circulation of the national banks, the internal-revenue system is oppressive and no longer necessary. This House can provide for its repeal. It can provide that all internal taxes, except those on distilled spirits and circulation of national banks, shall be abolished on the 1st of January next. It can provide that the taxes on distilled spirits shall be collected after that date by customs officers, and it can give an opportunity to the hordes of tax-gatherers who now infest this country and draw five millions in salaries annually to discuss civil-service reform from the stand-point of private citizenship.

Such a proceeding would be prudent. It would leave sufficient income to meet all the expenses of the Government, even at a more extravagant rate than the present. It would enable us to have a yearly surplus sufficient to our indebtedness, and it would leave a margin broad enough for all contingencies. In New York City this internal revenue has reduced the number of cigar and tobacco manufacturers from 15,000 to 1,500. It has given such a monopoly to a few match manufacturers that they readily buy out at his own price any one who has the audacity to compete with them. It has driven millions of capital from this country. Its collectors patrol our streets and dictate to our tradesmen, and its inspectors invade the privacy of every home and office and store and factory when the slightest suspicion of excuse is afforded.

All over the country the same influence is at work, and the same feeling of law-breaking and deception is engendered. Spying, lying, cheating, fear, hatred, and lawlessness are its outgrowth. You can scarcely enter the room of the chief officer of any of the districts without finding a lot of informers busy with him, or meet an honest business man who has had the honor of a visit from an inspector who does not feel something of the spirit of Wat. Tyler boil within him. We have had enough of these things. We are past needing them. Let them go with all other reminders of our late struggle. If we make provision now for a sweeping reduction, if we fix a date for the death of this pest, then all will have time to get ready; all will be relieved and benefited. If we allow it to live much longer we will have to choose between lavish expenditure, more lavish than the present, or the heaping up in the Treasury of sums which might elsewhere be employed in hiring labor and developing the resources of this country.

It is proper and possible for us to settle all questions of customs and revenue here and now. The House of Representatives is fully able to deal with the subject; it is composed of men who are daily studying the questions at issue from the most enlighted stand-point. Its efficient bureau of statistics and its power of summons will enable it to obtain all the information necessary. It is primed at all points, and its inaction is due rather to unwillingness than to inability, so far as I can judge. The country, too, is ready and eager for a revision. Our revenue laws are defective, as has been tacitly confessed by the committee in bringing in this bill. The only controversy is as to what preliminaries and formalities are necessary to our final judgment.

Shall we relegate to another age and condition of things the very instrument by which that age and condition may be ameliorated? Shall we turn over to an irresponsible body of men the consideration of a matter which properly belongs to us that they may work over it and draw salaries, and finally return it to us in much the same state as before?

If, in the face of a desire for revision as expressed by the representatives of the people and in spite of the necessity for speedy reform as is shown by our financial position, and without regard to the fact that we are the only authorized arbiters of these matters, we do this thing, then with equal or superior justice we may return home, and let commissioners appointed by the President do the residue of our work for us with a view of relieving the people from paying two sets of salaries at the same time for the same service.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I have been requested to yield for a motion that the committee rise. If it be the wish of the committee I will yield the floor for that purpose, and resume it when next we go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2315) providing for the appointment of a commission to examine the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to state that yesterday, when the votes were taken in reference to the limit of general debate upon the tariff-commission bill, I was paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WATSON.] The announcement of the pair was not then made.

SOUTH PACIFIC SQUADRON.

Mr. BELMONT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to this House complete copies of any and all orders and instructions from the Navy Department to the commanding officer or officers of the South Pacific squadron during the year 1881; and also copies of any and all letters, communications, or reports of such commanding officer or officers to the Navy Department during the same period.

MORTON MONUMENTAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. PEELLE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution of the House No. 96, granting condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association. The joint resolution has been returned from the Senate with amendments, in which I wish to ask concurrence. When the joint resolution passed the House it provided for granting condemned cannon without specifying the kind of cannon. The amendment of the Senate is to insert the words "cast-iron" between the words "condemned" and "cannon;" also to strike out the word "casting."

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. PEELLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LONGEVITY PAY OF OFFICERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask consent to report from the Committee on Naval Affairs at this time with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1384) to amend section 1556 of the Revised Statutes, giving longevity pay to certain officers of the Navy.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that.

Mr. TALBOTT. It is only for reference to the Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it come in in regular order.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. HISCOCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays the House will, at five o'clock in the afternoon, without further order, take a recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes in the evening of each day, for the consideration, for the remainder of that legislative day, of special orders of the House for business.

PUGET SOUND COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. BRENTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6103) authorizing the deputy collector of customs stationed at San Juan Island, in the Puget Sound district, to enter and clear vessels and collect duties; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LAND LAWS.

Mr. BRENTS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 203) for the printing of more copies of House Executive Document No. 47 and subsequent land laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

EDUCATION.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the body of a petition of citizens of Heard County, Georgia, upon the subject of education, and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the county of Heard, State of Georgia, deeply impressed with the dangers which threaten our institutions because of the appalling illiteracy of the voting population, as revealed in the last census, for the enlightenment of whom many of the States are unable to make adequate provision, and believing it to be the duty of Congress to provide for the public safety, no less in time of peace than in time of war, and that the enfranchisement of the freedmen by the United States Government imposes upon that Government the obligation to afford liberal aid to the States in their effort to prepare this class of citizens for the duties of citizenship, do earnestly pray that our Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled will take prompt and efficient measures to avert this danger; that moneys raised, in adequate amount, and from such sources as Congress may in its wisdom deem best, shall be distributed among the States and Territories, on the basis of illiteracy, and for the support of common schools conducted under local laws, under such guarantees as shall secure their application to this object with equal justice to all classes of citizens.

EDWIN WILKINSON.

Mr. GARRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6104) to rerate the pension of Edwin Wilkinson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REFORM OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have here a petition, with some eight hundred signatures, upon the subject of a reform of the tariff. I ask that the body of the petition, which is very brief, be printed in the RECORD, and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned, believing that a judicious and thorough reform of the tariff in the direction of commercial liberty cannot be delayed without disastrous effects to the prosperity of the country, respectfully petition your honorable body to pass a bill which shall be framed on the following principles:

1. Repeal of the duties on raw materials.
2. Proportionate reduction of the duties on articles manufactured from the raw materials thus placed on the free list.
3. No duties, excepting those on luxuries, to exceed 50 per cent. ad valorem.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 4, 1882.

Prayer by Rev. W. C. Cattell, D. D., President of Lafayette College, Pennsylvania.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he requests that an appropriation of $108,000 be made for constructing a fire-proof roof over the south and east wings of the building occupied by the Department of the Interior.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, May 2, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Director of the United States Geological Survey, communicating, in response to a resolution of April 18, information in regard to the mineral, agricultural, and other resources of Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of April 26, covering a statement from the Internal Revenue Office, showing the amount of tax collected on raw cotton, &c., from 1862 to 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting certain correspondence relative to the necessary enlargement of the military reservation of Fort Missoula, Montana Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of the Lower Fox River Valley, Wisconsin, praying that the complaints against the dams of the Lower Fox River should be fully investigated by Congress, with the reports of the engineers, before any definite action is taken; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of the Life-Saving Raft Company of New York, praying for an extension of their patent for what is known as the "Monitor life-raft;" which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of H. C. Smith and others, citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the passage of a bill for the establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present a memorial of citizens of Broadway, Rockingham County, Virginia, remonstrating against the discontinuance of the post-office at that place. I understand that Broadway is a town of about four hundred population, situated in Rockingham, one of the richest counties in the State, and that the post-office there has been discontinued because some persons who live in the town deposit letters in the postal-car instead of in the post-office. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, so as to have the matter looked into and to see whether a whole community is to be punished for the act of a few persons which I do not understand to be unlawful.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of the resolutions introduced in the House of Representatives by Hon. A. S. HEWITT as constituting the basis on which the proposed tariff commission should shape its action; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, California, in favor of a suitable appropriation for the Hydrographic Office, Bureau of Navigation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2538) to amend the act entitled "An act regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1878, and also to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate the proceedings before them, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 193) for the relief of certain employés on the work for the improvement of the Des Moines Rapids of the Mississippi River, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT POINT PATTERSON.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1013) for the erection of a light-house at or near Point Patterson, on the northern shore of Lake Michigan, to report it favorably, and with it a letter from the Light-House Board, recommending the passage of the bill. I ask, as it is a small matter, for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the necessity for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CONGER. The object of passing the bill immediately is that the light-house may be erected this season. If the work is postponed for any considerable time it cannot be done. It is a small light-house necessary at that point, the only one provided for the business on the northern shore of Lake Michigan, and if the bill can be passed the light-house can be erected and will be ready for the fall service.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $15,000 for the erection of a light-house at or near Point Patterson, on the northern shore of Lake Michigan, in the State of Michigan, under the direction of the Light-House Board.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the letter of the Light-House Board be read.

The Acting Secretary read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, February 15, 1882.

SIR: The Light-House Board has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Department letter (E. W. C.) of February 14, 1882, transmitting, for the views of the board thereon, S. bill No. 1013, providing for the erection of a light-house at or near Point Patterson, on the northern shore of Lake Michigan, this bill having been referred to the Department by the Senate Committee on Commerce for suggestion.

In reply I beg to say that this matter has been considered by the board, and that the conclusion has been reached that the interests of commerce and navigation require that a light should be established at or near Point Patterson, as contemplated by the bill referred to.

The letter of transmittal of the Committee on Commerce and the bill, S. No. 1013, are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

JOHN RODGERS,
Rear-Admiral, United States Navy, Chairman.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. CONGER. I will state that the bill is reported unanimously by the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1826) for the preservation of the woods and forests of the national domain adjacent to the sources of the navigable rivers and their affluents in the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill was prepared by gentlemen of distinction and character who are interested in the subject-matter. It has recently been the subject of a congress of citizens convened in Cincinnati. It organizes a commission of officers of the Army, and does not involve any expense. The object of the measure is apparent to every one. I think it is of the very highest importance, probably as important as any subject which can receive the consideration of Congress. The subject of the preservation of forests, the planting of trees, &c., has not yet been maturely considered. This bill proposes to organize a commission for that purpose. I think the proper committee to which it should be referred is the Committee on Agriculture, as it relates mainly to that subject. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1827) to give effect to patents for land in the Virginia military district of Ohio, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask leave to introduce a bill. It is very voluminous, and I will call the attention of the Senate to it. It is a bill prepared by the State Department at the request of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I desire to have the bill and the accompanying papers from the State Department printed.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1828) concerning the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to amend the Revised Statutes from section 4082 to 4130, inclusive; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLER, of California, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1829) to amend an act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The bill relates to the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, and I move that it be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHILCOTT asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1830) to amend section 2325 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (by request,) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1831) for the relief of Edward Tattersall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1832) granting a pension to Leonard Weber; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1833) correcting the pension granted to Lieutenant George W. Graham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GROVER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1834) for the relief of citizens of the State of Oregon and of Idaho and Washington Territories who served with the United States troops in the war with the Nez Percé and Bannack Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of such as were killed in such service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1835) for the relief of William A. Cowles; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INDEMNITY FOR LOST CALLED BONDS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer a resolution which I send to the Chair, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of called or overdue bonds of the United States to the true owners thereof in cases in which any such bonds shall have been lost, stolen, or destroyed, and under suitable regulations for the security of the United States against any loss in such cases, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg to call the attention of the chairman and members of the Committee on Finance to the importance of the law suggested in the resolution. There are many persons, innocent creditors of the Government, who are kept out of their just claims by reason of the evidences of the indebtedness having been lost or stolen. Certainly the Government does not wish to retain the money of its citizens without consideration. The objection made to paying these claims heretofore has been that the bonds were not called. I believe the lawyers hold that the bonds of the Government pass from hand to hand like currency, and that if bonds stolen or alleged to be destroyed should turn up they would be a just claim against the Government; but now that the bonds have been called they would not be paid upon presentation if there was any protest filed against it in the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to my friend that there is an existing law now which provides for indemnity where the loss is proved clearly and unequivocally and the owners are able to describe the bonds, and will give sufficient security to the Government against their presentation hereafter. Such a law is already on the statute-book.

Mr. ANTHONY. That only applies to the cases of bonds which have been destroyed. This resolution directs an inquiry into the matter of indemnity to persons who have had bonds stolen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Acting Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase twenty sets of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: Provided, They can be had for fifty cents per volume, the said books to be placed in the Senate Library for the use of the Senate, and to be paid for from the contingent fund of the Senate.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the necessity for that number of sets? Have we not saved enough for our own use?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are only ten sets in the Senate Library. Those are frequently all out, and Senators call for them and they cannot be supplied. The resolution proposes to supply twenty more sets to our Library.

Mr. COCKRELL. How many sets are required to be kept in the Senate Library?

Mr. ANTHONY. Ten.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then ought not the committee of which the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island is chairman to report some provision by which the number can be increased, instead of going into the market and buying these copies from second-hand book-sellers?

Mr. ANTHONY. I hold in my hand a resolution to provide for more copies of the future publication, but this is for the past sets. They can be bought for fifty cents a volume, which is less than it would cost the Government to bind them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then perhaps we had better dispense with the ten sets we have and buy them all, if we can get them cheaper.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator objects——

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not object. I want the number requisite; but if we can buy them cheaper than we can print them, we had better stop the printing of them.

Mr. INGALLS. How many volumes are there?

Mr. ANTHONY. The volumes since the RECORD was printed by the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. Since the publication of the Globe ceased?

Mr. ANTHONY. Since the printing of the Globe was given up. We can buy them of second-hand book-sellers.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator why is it that he makes the appropriation out of the contingent fund of the Senate? That is very low now I understand, not enough to cover the ordinary expenses, and it looks to me as if we were trespassing upon that fund very often when we ought not to do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. These volumes are for the Library of the Senate, and I think it is very proper that the payment should be made out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think it ought not to be an appropriation out of the contingent fund. We have been passing resolutions here from time to time to take money out of the contingent fund when there is hardly any in it. We passed resolutions probably taking $20,000, or in that neighborhood, out of that fund, in one day to pay election expenses. It appears to me that such payments belong to the general fund and ought to come out of the Treasury. The contingent fund is made up generally by the financial clerk as close as he can get it to pay the ordinary expenses of the Senate, and when a trespass of this kind is made upon it we are always deficient, and other meritorious things have to go over and cannot be paid.

Of course I make no special objection to the resolution, but I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Printing that these books ought to be paid for out of the general fund by an appropriation made for that purpose, which can be provided for in some appropriation bill, so as not to have it come out of the contingent fund, for the money, as I understand, is not there for all these things.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would require the passage of a bill through both Houses.

Mr. DAWES. I did not hear distinctly the answer of the Senator from Rhode Island to the inquiry of whom the Government would buy these sets of the RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. Second-hand book-sellers.

Mr. DAWES. Could the Committee on Printing devise no method by which they could keep the Government from selling them to the second-hand book-sellers in order to have them bought back?

Mr. ANTHONY. You would have to give great power to the Committee on Printing to restrain the second-hand book-sellers from buying books of any who have them for sale.

Mr. DAWES. I speak of the Government. I suppose the Government sells them to the second-hand book-sellers in order to have them bought back. Is not that the fact?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir. The Government sells no books, except on order given in advance of the publication.

Mr. DAWES. How do the second-hand book-sellers get all these copies of the RECORD that are needed now, when the Government makes them itself?

Mr. ANTHONY. Partly because Senators and Representatives sell their books to second-hand book-sellers.

Mr. DAWES. And then come here and vote to buy them back. Is that it?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know whether those who sell them are those who vote to buy them back, but I think it is but justice to those who sell their books to say that they are not always sold for money, but are exchanged for other public documents. For instance, some Senators and Representatives require books relating to mechanics, while other Senators and Representatives require books relating to agriculture, and they exchange their books sometimes.

Mr. DAWES. Exchange them with second-hand book-sellers. I do not see that that helps it along any. The second-hand book-sellers must get them from the Government in order to have them to exchange.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not responsible for the fact. It is the fact that books printed by the Government can be bought at the second-hand book-stores for much less than the cost of publication.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Rhode Island know of any other way that these volumes can be obtained now except from second-hand dealers?

Mr. ANTHONY. Only by paying the full price which it would cost the Government to print them.

Mr. DAWES. I am opposed to the encouragement of this traffic. I think that this resolution will directly encourage the business of the Government or somebody else selling to the second-hand book-sellers the books that we come in here and vote to buy back from the second-hand book-sellers. Certainly the second-hand book-sellers would be pretty busy if all they can get for a song they can sell to the Government back again for the full price. I am opposed to the whole proceeding.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am unwilling to leave that unfavorable impression on the Senate which is created by the Senator from Massachusetts. He does not know of a book so precious and so costly printed to the number of ten copies anywhere in the world, by anybody, Government or private individual, that will not get into the hands of second-hand book-sellers sooner or later. Men die and their libraries are dispersed; men fail and their libraries are sold; and in a thousand imaginable ways second-hand dealers get hold of everything precious in the world; and Congressional documents are not very precious in general in money, a large portion of them. They get hold of them in perfectly legitimate ways, and then they begin to act as brokers. I have had them come to me and say, "Now, you have not an agricultural district, let me have five hundred of your Agricultural Reports, and I will give you something your people care more about;" and various offers of that sort are made. I have had very little occasion to deal with them, but I have frequently gone to them and bought such books, and I have bought them at less than they cost the Government. That is what we go to the second-hand book-sellers for, in general. Their trade is perfectly legitimate, unless they induce some Senator or Representative to commit some sort of a crime, of which I have no knowledge in the world.

Mr. DAWES. I have no desire to make any unjust charge or to have any unjust suspicion raised upon this worthy class of people, but it is not worth while for the Senator from Connecticut to attempt to cover up a fact which is just as plain as noonday. Second-hand book-sellers are engaged in the business of gathering up out of members of Congress the books which we are called upon by resolution to vote to buy back of them; and there is no need of attempting to cover it because it will not be successful. The people see through this thing if the Senator from Connecticut does not. The exchange by members of books that they desire to exchange is one thing, and it cannot be confounded with the traffic that is going on here in this city, which is quite another thing.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. WINDOM addressed the Chair.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me reply to that, Mr. President; I think I ought to have the floor. The Senator from Massachusetts is perfectly well aware that I am covering up nothing; that there is nothing to cover up.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why did he insinuate that I was endeavoring to conceal or cover up something? It is but a few days since in the Senate I spoke of this very thing as indicating that we published more books than were needed of certain classes.

I reaffirm that so far as second-hand dealers are concerned, their business is as legitimate as that of the gentleman when he practices his profession in Berkshire County, Massachusetts, and that inevitably every book, of all sorts, some time or other, like every valuable picture, and every other work of art, gets into the hands of second-hand dealers.

This is a simple matter of economy. You can print these books yourself at a cost of from one to three dollars a volume, from the old plates at the Printing Office, or you can go here to some of these men and get them for fifty cents a volume.

Mr. DAWES. I would not insinuate that the Senator from Connecticut is trying to do anything wrong or that these second-hand book-sellers are engaged in an unlawful business. The only thing is that we had better call it by its right name. That is all I desire about it. This attempt to put in other words with the vain idea of thinking that it is not understood, is all I object to.

Mr. WINDOM It strikes me that the statements made by the Senators from Rhode Island and Massachusetts involve a pretty serious matter. If Members and Senators are really selling to second-hand bookstores books that are printed for distribution among their constituents, I think it ought to be known, and I think the names of the men who do it in either House ought to be known. I hope that some resolution will be offered investigating this question. It may not of itself be very important, but it certainly contains a grave charge against members of the Senate. I do not know how the dealers receive their books; I know they are there for sale; but if they do obtain them as suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, the names of those who furnish them ought to be published.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Connecticut, as he generally does when he makes a good speech, anticipated precisely what I intended to say. These second-hand book-sellers have agents all over the country, and persons to whom we send the books sell them to the agents of these second-hand book-sellers and they are transmitted to Washington. In that way, as the Senator says, everything that is printed, however valuable, or every work of art, however precious, goes into the hands of second-hand dealers.

But, Mr. President, I do not think it is advisable under this resolution to attempt to reform the practice in this respect. The Senators are suffering for the lack of these volumes of the RECORD. They send to the Library for them and they are all out. They can be bought for fifty cents a volume. We have a number of the Globes that were purchased of Rives & Bailey, but they are not generally bound, and it would cost more to bind them than it would to buy them of the second-hand book-sellers. However, this resolution does not apply to the Globe; it only applies to the RECORD, and I think it is advisable that we should accommodate ourselves by passing the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NUMBER OF RECORD FOR SENATE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, Mr. President, I have a cognate resolution, which I offer, and ask for its reference to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the Public Printer be directed to furnish, commencing with the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, 3,425 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the use of the Senate, instead of 3,100 copies, as ordered by the concurrent resolution of June 4, 1879.

ALLEGATIONS OF IMPROPER INFLUENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions the morning hour has closed.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to call up the resolution offered by me yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the morning business is through, I desire to ask the Senate to take up and pass the bill (H. R. No. 4199) for the erection of a public building at Lynchburgh, Virginia. The bill has passed the House and been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Does not my resolution come up under the head of morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana may be called up before bills on the Calendar are considered. It will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. VOORHEES:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair, whose duty it shall be to investigate and ascertain whether any corrupt or improper influences have been brought to bear on any member of this body in regard to House bill No. 5656, now pending before the Senate Finance Committee, being a bill to amend certain laws on the subject of distilled spirits in special bonded warehouses; and said committee shall also inquire whether any attempt of any kind has been made to bring such improper or corrupt influences to bear on any member of this body in order to secure the passage or the defeat of said bill; and said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and shall report the result of such investigation at as early a day as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution is taken up under the Anthony rule.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to propose an amendment to the resolution. After the word "bill," in the third line from the end, I propose to insert:

And also whether any money has been raised by contributions or otherwise from parties in interest for the purpose of securing the passage or defeat of said bill, and if so, for what uses it has been expended.

Mr. VOORHEES. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is accepted by the mover of the resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. After the word "papers," in the second line from the end, I move to insert "and employ a stenographer."

Mr. VOORHEES. I accept that also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified. The resolution will be read as now modified, so that the Senate may understand it.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair, whose duty it shall be to investigate and ascertain whether any corrupt or improper influences have been brought to bear on any member of this body in regard to House bill No. 5656, now pending before the Senate Finance Committee, being a bill to amend certain laws on the subject of distilled spirits in special bonded warehouses; and said committee shall also inquire whether any attempt of any kind has been made to bring such improper or corrupt influences to bear on any member of this body in order to secure the passage or the defeat of said bill, and also whether any money has been raised by contributions or otherwise, from parties in interest, for the purpose of securing the passage or defeat of said bill, and if so for what uses it has been expended; and said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer, and shall report the result of such investigation at as early a day as possible.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, it is but just to the Senate to say that I have not the slightest reason to believe that any of these improper practices have taken place. It is just to the Senate, and to each member of the Senate, to say that this resolution is offered because my own name has been used in a slanderous connection, not as imputing a want of integrity to me, but an aspersion that influences were placed that might affect my vote on this question. I have nothing to leave, when I leave this world, except my name; I have not grown rich in the service of the Government, and I do not intend now to allow, and I never have allowed an aspersion, however remote it may be, to rest upon my reputation as a public servant. Hence, I felt that this was the best method to meet it.

I can say truthfully that there has not been the slightest approach, direct or indirect, immediate or remote, to me on this or on any other bill, of an improper character, since I have been a member of this body, or while I was a member of the other House.

I can say further that I never have been asked how I expected to vote on this bill, because it was perfectly well known when the bill known as the Carlisle bill came from the House that I was ranked as one of its friends, and it was not necessary for anybody to make inquiry as to my position, nor is my position difficult to find on any question when inquiry is made. But when newspaper statements take a man's name and spread it broadcast over the country, although not making charges, it is as well to investigate and see what can be proven and what cannot, and for that reason I introduced this resolution.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I was not in the Senate yesterday when my friend from Indiana introduced his resolution; nor had I, or any one else so far as I know, the slightest intimation that he meant to offer it; but I have read to-day the remarks that accompanied the resolution and the resolution itself, and I am constrained to say that I regret that a gentleman so well known, who has the personal respect and confidence of those who know him, whether they may agree with his opinions or not, should have thought it worth his while upon the baseless and anonymous articles in a newspaper to ask for the services of a committee of five members of this body.

Mr. President, I sympathize thoroughly with the feeling of resentment that my friend has expressed against these miserable and base calumnies. A public man becomes the target for the vile abuse of secret foes, and nothing that he may do can possibly protect him against such statements. He will live them down, and these poor shafts will fall broken at his feet, for truth is omnipotent and public justice certain. Upon that phrase and upon the comfort of that phrase, I would have my friend from Indiana rest with me and with his brethren in this Senate who know him.

There has been nothing and can be nothing in anonymous scribblings for newspapers to put a member of this Senate upon his reply and upon his defense. We are here for public ends. Our time ought to be and I believe usually is occupied in the faithful transaction of important business. We cannot afford to allow that time to be consumed and occupied by investigating these idle, groundless, nameless, fatherless, sponsorless charges. It cannot be; they make no weight upon that great tribunal to which we all must appeal, the honest public opinion of our fellow-countrymen. Therefore it is that I hope five Senators of this body will not be set to the task of examining charges absurd upon their face, and without a single trace of responsibility in their authorship.

Does any man stand up here and say that there is the slightest ground for them? Has he heard even from any one of respectable character—I was going to say of any character—that he has knowledge of these things, or reason to believe they are true? Or is not this another specimen of the idle scandal which for want of honest occupation finds pleasure in casting slurs upon those who are made by their public position the targets for such abuse?

I trust that this resolution will not be adopted. No man is a judge in his own case. My friend from Indiana is not perhaps a judge in his. I better prove the kindly feeling and the high esteem in which I hold him, by saying here that there is nothing that makes such an investigation needful, either in regard to himself or any other member of the Senate or of the committee in question with relation to this matter. I hope the Senate will not vote in favor of this resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana had consulted with me I should have advised him against introducing the resolution; I do not believe there is anything at the base of it; but the Senator having thought it necessary to introduce the resolution, I shall vote for it because he asks it and for no other reason.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has felt it his duty to introduce this resolution. As a colleague with him on the Committee on Finance, I shall vote against it. I have known the Senator for many years, not only in this branch of the legislative department of the Government, but in the other, and while I have radically differed with him upon political questions, regarding him a partisan of the most stalwart type, I as well on the other side, and it may be we have made some comments on each other, yet, upon a question that touches his integrity as regards questions of legislation with which he is intrusted, I should be false to my manhood if I did not stand by the Senator from Indiana. He could not well do otherwise, I admit, than introduce the resolution, but I trust the Senate will vote it down. He has, for his just vindication, done his duty. If each of this Senate is to be subject to flippant irresponsible criticism upon a question of integrity as regards duty here in Senatorial responsibility, I think it is high time for us to take the stand that will at least be my pleasure in voting against the resolution and sustaining, so far as I know, the integrity of the Senator from Indiana.

If political differences are to blear our eyes and blunt our consciences to the duty we owe to the honor, integrity, dignity, and manhood of fellow-members of this high legislative body, then partisanship is not the honorable method which I am allied to and which I have long cherished as my weapon of political warfare.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Indiana will not for a moment believe that in offering my amendment I meant to make in the most distant way any indorsement of the truth of the charges against himself to which he refers. If there were nothing in the resolution but what was contained in it when he offered it, I should vote against it, but the Senator from Indiana has accepted the amendment which I proposed, and therefore I shall vote for the resolution. I vote for it because I believe upon information which has been presented to me—although I cannot vouch for its accuracy or reliability—that a large sum has been raised by the whisky ring, so called, for the purpose of procuring the passage of this bill through Congress. I believe that, I say, upon information which has been given to me which I cannot vouch for, but yet which is sufficient to induce me to inquire into it. I believe this thing ought to be inquired into further, because this bill presents opportunities for the operation of a whisky ring which will pale into utter insignificance the whisky ring of a few years ago. I believe that if this bill pass, this country will within the next two or three years be shocked by the development and operation of a whisky ring in comparison with which the former one will be utterly insignificant. There are $67,000,000 now owing to the Government for taxes on whisky in bond, and this bill proposes in substance to relieve the ring from the inconvenience of those bonds, and give it an opportunity to raid upon that immense sum of Government money. I am informed that money has been raised to carry that thing through. I know nothing personally of the truth of this charge, but I want the Senate to investigate it, and let us go to the bottom of it.

Mr. FERRY. I am very glad that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] in his closing remarks has placed the matter in its proper light. I am a member of the Committee on Finance, before which this subject comes. I am prepared in advance to say that so far as advised I am against the unlimited bonded proposition which the Senator from Minnesota has condemned. At the same time I am not willing to allow any comment or criticism unchallenged upon the integrity of any committee colleague or member of this body when I know him by association and work to be honest in his legislative relations. For that reason, while I do denounce any outside attempt to control legislation, if that be the case—though I know not of it in this matter—and while I have my own convictions upon the subject mentioned and substantially concur with the Senator from Minnesota, yet albeit a Democrat even of the rankest type as the Senator from Indiana is known to be, (and we have had passages at arms a little here on political questions,) still on a question of legislative integrity and as his colleague on the committee I will stand by his fidelity to the duties and responsibilities of that committee, especially when I believe him to be intentionally honest, as I believe myself to be intentionally honest in the discharge of Senatorial functions.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I shall vote in any way that the Senator from Indiana desires, though I think he can well afford to withdraw the resolution; but I have never believed or suspected, until the Senator from Minnesota made the announcement just now, that there was any "whisky ring" here seeking to corrupt anybody in regard to the passage of the House bill which has been alluded to. If that is the case, or if there is any reasonable ground to believe it, it makes it absolutely imperative that an investigation should be had, not so far as the Senator from Indiana or any member of the committee is concerned, but if there is any ring connected with this bill improperly seeking to control legislation let us go to the bottom of it.

I desire, because Mr. CARLISLE, a member of the House from Kentucky, sent it to me a few moments ago, indeed I received it while the Senator from Minnesota was speaking, to read a telegram which he desired I should hand to the Senator from Indiana, but I now think it best to read it to the Senate. Much of the newspaper talk on this subject grew out of what was alleged to have been said by a gentleman in Louisville, Mr. Atherton, one of our ablest, most reliable, and best business men, who sent this dispatch.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, May 4, 1882.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE.

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Statements and opinions expressed by myself concerning the pending whisky legislation have been greatly exaggerated and misrepresented. I will publish correct statement over my own signature. Meanwhile please assure Senator VOORHEES that I never heard his name, nor the name of any member of either House of Congress mentioned by any lobbyist or agent in connection with the bill, and have never stated anything inconsistent with this fact.

J. M. ATHERTON.

I think Mr. CARLISLE intended that I should merely hand this to the Senator from Indiana, but in view of what has just transpired it is very well to read it to the Senate. It will, I doubt not, be entirely satisfactory to the Senator from Indiana, and disposes of much of the criticism which some newspapers have seen fit to indulge in. I consider the Senator from Indiana as needing no vindication from any quarter, but since it is charged on this floor that there is an organized scheme of fraud connected with this bill, of a magnitude that will make all the other rings that have ever been organized pale before it and appear insignificant, now is the time to have a prompt investigation made.

I am one of those who believe that the House bill is an honest measure mainly because the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, after as careful a consideration as bills usually receive, unanimously reported it, because they believed it to be an honest bill in the interest of business and in the interest of the Government. I know the gentlemen who compose that committee, and I know that there are men on it who stand as high, both as regards ability, integrity, and care for the public interest, as the Senator from Minnesota, or any Senator on this floor. I believe every one of them is just as honest and as free from jobbery as any of us. I believe, too, that the bill as framed by them not only will not produce or facilitate fraud, but that it is based upon the only true principle of taxation, and that is to impose and levy the tax upon consumption. And it is approved by the very able and intelligent Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Distilled spirits alone of all domestic products are required to pay tax before they are put on the market. Let me show how it works; I only state this as an example. I was told by a gentleman the other day, speaking of the distilling business in the city of Peoria, that in that city there were forty thousand bushels of corn used every day for distilling and other purposes. The product of a thousand acres of the best land in Illinois, at forty bushels to the acre, is consumed in that business every day. It is as honest and legitimate business as any other. What can those men do with that corn otherwise? They cannot send it abroad; it will not bear the cost of transportation abroad in the shape of corn. If they do send it there they cannot buy with the money they get for it what they want. Our laws forbid that in order to protect somebody here. They have to use it in some form at home. The Government can only properly or continuously receive or require the tax on what can be consumed during each year; yet all distillers everywhere are required now to pay ninety cents on each gallon they make before they can make a sale, or whether they can find a market or not. Cut off from the foreign market, their home market destroyed or crippled by threatened legislation, all they ask is that they shall be allowed to place all their produce in the hands of a bonded Government officer, let him hold it, and keep the key of the warehouse. They do not want even to look at it in his absence; they do not want to be allowed even to enter their own house without the consent of the Government officer; but they ask you not to force them when they are pursuing a legitimate business, now depressed by overproduction and threatened legislation, to pay ninety cents a gallon on whisky before they can sell it, or upon an amount of whisky that, by evaporation or from any other legitimate cause, does not exist when they do sell it. They insist, and I agree with them, that the tax should be collected upon consumption, and upon the amount consumed, and upon the article when it goes into consumption. Congress has no right, in my opinion, to tax anything else. Any other mode of taxation is a tax on production, which is unjust, unequal, and in violation of the fundamental principle of equality of taxes.

The Senator from Minnesota has intimated in the charge he has made that the men who are seeking this relief are guilty of organized fraud, therefore he wants an investigation. I avow here that so far as I understand the bill, and I have tried to understand it, it is an honest bill. I expect on the floor of the Senate to develop that fact, and to show that the Government will not lose nor be cheated out of a dollar by it, and I propose to show to the satisfaction of the Senator from Minnesota that neither the men who are engaged in that business, whether they live in Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, or anywhere else, are seeking to organize any ring or to defraud the Government, but on the contrary, that they are as honestly engaged in as honest business as any business man in this Senate is engaged in, and that they are as honest men as any of us. If I am mistaken in that I shall be very much surprised. I think the Senate will agree with me after I have explained my reasons for the votes I expect to give; still, in view of what has been said, I want the investigation made promptly, fully, and thoroughly.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the Senator did not understand me as saying or intimating in the most distant manner that any member of the Senate or of the House was in any "ring" on the subject.

Mr. BECK. I did understand that the Senator said there was a ring here to carry it out and that he intimated that every man who is not a fool must know it, and that every man who votes for the bill is voting in the interest of fraud.

Mr. WINDOM. Oh, no!

Mr. BECK. I want that investigation made.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator assumes quite too much. I merely said that I believed there was a ring; that ring I believe is outside of these bodies; and I believe that that bill passed through the House without the least consideration; that it never was debated. Under the previous question it was passed, and no discussion was ever had upon it.

Mr. BECK. I said that every member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House had thoroughly considered it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will not be led into the discussion of a bill that is now pending before a committee of this body. It has been there pretty well considered for two weeks, and there has not been the slightest sign of a lobby or influence brought upon that committee or, so far as I know, upon any member of it. The committee will probably divide upon the subject of the passage of the bill and report their views to this body in due time. So far as I have seen, there has not been even the usual excitement in regard to such a bill before the Committee on Finance. I have not seen the slightest evidence of interest in it except that we have received letters and telegrams in regard to the bill on both sides of the question. Many of us now have made up our minds about it; but I do not think the question of the merits or the demerits of the bill ought to be alluded to here, because they must be brought before the Senate of the United States for trial hereafter.

Now, in respect to the question presented by the Senator from Indiana, I intend to be governed entirely by his wishes. If he thinks, after reading the statements made in the newspapers, that they impute to him any act of dishonor, or reflect in the slightest degree upon his good character, it is his right—and no man ought to dispute that right—to demand an investigation; and if he asks for it he shall have it, if my vote can give it to him. It is the only defense that he can offer. He must either submit in silence and in patience to a false accusation to grow into a calumny, or he must demand to meet his accusers face to face. I shall therefore be guided entirely by his wishes in regard to the adoption of the original resolution.

As to the proposition made by the Senator from Minnesota, I think that ought to be considered as a separate thing. If the Senator from Indiana insists upon his resolution I shall vote for it. Although I have read the papers and have read the extracts in the papers upon which this resolution is founded, I must say that there is not even a charge in those papers of an act of dishonor or discredit to the Senator from Indiana; there is not even an imputation upon his conduct, and therefore I do not think, as an original proposition, there is a sufficient base for this inquiry into his conduct or that anything has been said in the newspapers that affects him in the slightest degree.

That is my opinion, and I know from my observation of his conduct in regard to this matter and other matters in the Committee on Finance that there is not the slightest ground for it. But still if he, wounded in his sentiment of honor, thinks there is, I shall vote for the investigation.

The charge brought to us by the Senator from Minnesota, not upon his own information but upon the information of others, I think is one which should be investigated whether the other is or not. I would rather separate the two than mingle them together. It will be difficult for anybody to vote against the inquiry proposed by the Senator from Minnesota now, since he has made the accusation upon information that he believes to be correct. If large sums of money have been collected together from persons interested in this bill to influence the conduct of either House, or to influence the surroundings of either House, it is the duty of the respective Houses to investigate into that matter. That is an accusation made by a Senator upon his responsibility as a Senator upon information that he gives credit to; but the other accusation, upon which the resolution of the Senator from Indiana is founded, is the mere idle carping of a newspaper correspondent; from whom no one knows; by whom no man knows; what interest he has, or what motive impels him, no man knows. The paper does not say that the Senator has done anything wrong, but that somebody has said that he can influence the Senator to vote for or against a certain bill. It seems to me that there is not enough in that accusation to justify the Senate of the United States in appointing a committee, unless the Senator himself is satisfied that it tends to injure him, and if so I wish to give him the benefit of a clear and full investigation.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the allegations made by the Senator from Minnesota are grave, direct, and serious, and as such they form the proper basis of an inquiry by the Senate; and it is his duty, in my judgment, after the assertion that he has made, to ask that a committee may be appointed to investigate those facts which he has said he has information are true and believes to be true. But I am one of those who believe that the anonymous and impersonal calumnies of an irresponsible newspaper put no man on the defensive, and I am unwilling that allegations of the gravity of those which have been made by the Senator from Minnesota should be appended as an amendment to a resolution like that offered by the Senator from Indiana. Stung by what he believes to be an injury to his honor, but which is believed by no man who knows him either personally or by reputation, he has risen here and asked that these unjustifiable calumnies may be made the subject of inquiry for the purpose of removing any stain that might rest upon his honor. I think, sir, that he has done what is not required to be done. I shall wait with impatience to vote for a committee upon the allegations made by the Senator from Minnesota as an independent proposition; but as to the resolution now pending, I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to my friend from Kansas that since the telegram read by the Senator from Kentucky from the only witness, as I understand, in this case, or the only one upon whose testimony any charge has been made upon the Senator from Indiana, it would be proper to strike out all down to the proposition made by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; I want an opportunity to vote on the creation of a committee to investigate the allegations made by the Senator from Minnesota, and I shall not consent to any modification of the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana. I ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HARRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I desire now the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to be kind enough, in view of the charges made by the Senator from Minnesota, to read the petition signed by every banker in the city of Louisville, in the city of Lexington, many from Cincinnati, with regard to this bill, and I think it will at least help mitigate some of the bold assertions of "whisky rings" and fraud made by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HARRIS. I will yield in a moment for the reading of the paper. As a member of the Committee on Finance, and one who has attended its every meeting, one who has advocated from the beginning and expects to advocate to the end the passage of the bill in question, I desire to say that the Senator from Indiana has been less pronounced in respect to the matter perhaps than any member of the committee. I may perhaps say that without impropriety in respect to the actions of the committee. I desire to say more, that any intimation or insinuation that the Senator from Indiana or any other member of that committee has ever been approached by rings or other people with improper motives or reasons to be used to influence his action is so utterly absurd that, for one, I will never consent to dignify such an intimation or insinuation by making it the subject of investigation or inquiry. The reputation of that Senator and of every other Senator who holds a position upon that committee places him immeasurably above the possibility of such an intimation as the one that has been published affecting his reputation before the country, in my opinion, in the slightest degree; and for that reason I shall very cheerfully vote for the motion of the Senator from Kansas to postpone indefinitely this resolution, while I am ready to vote for a resolution incorporating the views and seeking the investigation that the Senator from Minnesota has asked for if he desires to introduce a resolution for that purpose.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I think——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution is being considered under the Anthony rule, but there is a motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the paper may be read that was called for by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is not necessary; the Senator has the right to speak on this motion.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not wish to speak just now; I wish to ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the amendment which I proposed be withdrawn.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to withdraw it with a view of offering it as a separate resolution after the other resolution shall have been acted upon. I have felt a great deal of delicacy in intruding it upon the other resolution; and no one entertains a kinder feeling or a higher regard for the Senator from Indiana than myself; but I would prefer to have the matters separated. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment, and I will renew it afterward as a separate proposition.

Mr. FERRY. Then I hope the Senator from Kansas will withdraw his motion to indefinitely postpone, and let us vote against the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Minnesota are withdrawn, the Chair hearing no objection.

Mr. VEST. Does that leave now the original resolution of the Senator from Indiana alone pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. Now, in regard to that, just one word. The Senate is not without precedents in regard to matters of this kind, and I call the attention of my friend from Indiana—and he knows that I am his friend under all circumstances—to the action of the Senate, and particularly of our side of the Senate, in regard to a similar request preferred some time ago by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] That Senator called the attention of the Senate to an attack made upon him in a newspaper, compared to which this is a mere zephyr to a cyclone; and at that time the late Senator from Ohio, Mr. Thurman, announced what was considered by a large majority of the Senate the proper and correct doctrine. I recollect distinctly one of his expressions, which I thoroughly indorse, was that if the precedent were to be established in the Senate, that as a matter of courtesy, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] now announces it, any Senator could rise and demand a committee of investigation in regard to an anonymous or journalistic attack upon him; any Senator could have the monopoly of the entire time of the Senate, to the exclusion of all public business, and we should be turned into a regular systematized organization of investigating committees. A large majority of the Senate indorsed that proposition and voted down the resolution then offered, and I believe my friend from Indiana voted with me.

That is one aspect of the case, and, much as I respect the Senator from Indiana—and almost love him—I may be permitted to say I cannot vote for a resolution of this sort, believing that the public interests are antagonistic to it.

The proposition of the Senator from Minnesota is entirely different. As my friend from Kentucky suggests, the Senator from Minnesota in his proposed resolution covers the entire investigation, as I understand. When a Senator of the United States rises here in his place and says that he has information, which he believes, that there is an organized system of corruption in regard to any committee or any member, there is but one thing to be done; that is, to have an investigation. That affects the integrity of this entire body, its legislation, and the public interests. But a personal matter coming from an anonymous source is a matter of investigation by the courts of the country. If the Senator from Indiana, or any other Senator, considers himself aggrieved by a libel the law of the land protects him as it does every other citizen; but the time of the Senate belongs to the country and the people.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota have put a very different phase upon this question. As to all of the resolution that relates to the Senator from Indiana, I have nothing to add to what I said before, and in regard to that my opinion and my action will be unchanged, with this condition, that it is understood that the Senator from Minnesota will upon his own responsibility, as stated here in the Senate, offer a resolution of inquiry in order to have the fullest investigation of the very alarming condition of facts which he has stated here to have been charged and in which he believes. That is enough for me. When a Senator on this floor shall state that the fountain of legislation is sought to be corrupted or is in danger of being corrupted, then there can be no higher duty and no better employment of public time than to carry that question down to its very roots, and I propose to aid in that. I have not changed my judgment in regard to the base scurrility with respect to my friend from Indiana, and I shall not object to voting down his application for a committee on that subject. I only do it now with the understanding that the Senator from Minnesota will renew this question and will ask for a searching investigation in regard to the important facts to which he has drawn the attention of the Senate.

I will say further that this measure is to-day pending before a committee of the Senate; it came to the Senate a few weeks ago from the other House; it has been the subject of consideration in that committee; counsel have appeared before the committee. It is not improper to mention that Mr. Wharton, the late district attorney of the United States for Kentucky, has appeared before the committee and made and filed a very able and intelligent argument in favor of the passage of the bill. It still lies there for consideration, undecided, unvoted upon. We presumed and intended to-morrow to have a special meeting of the committee to continue the consideration, but I think that prior to that consideration, or at least concurrently with it, there should come the examination suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, in which I most heartily concur.

Therefore I wish it understood that while I shall not vote to have the accusation against my friend from Indiana rise to the dignity of a Senatorial investigation, I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. In order that I may be distinctly understood, Mr. President, and in response to the statements of the Senator from Delaware, I will say that to-morrow morning I will offer the resolution; and while I am on my feet I wish to repeat, a little more distinctly perhaps than I did before, that I have no personal knowledge of this, but the information is brought to me by a person in whom I have confidence. I believe in it sufficiently to be willing to investigate it, and I believe it ought to be investigated. That is my exact position.

Mr. BAYARD. That is sufficient authority, to my mind.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ought to say one word before this matter passes away. The publications in the press which use my name purport to be based upon statements by gentlemen at Louisville, Kentucky, not, as I said a while ago, impeaching my integrity, but asserting that some one here, or some number of persons, had represented that they could control my vote on this question. I did not feel the necessity which a gentleman feels for vindication when his integrity is directly impeached, but I did feel that an investigation ought to take place to find whether the statements of this gentleman, made in Kentucky, were true or not. Consequently, as soon as I saw it I thought, as I think now, that it was a thing proper for investigation. Yesterday I introduced the resolution asking for an investigation. The result of the introduction of that resolution is very apparent. This morning the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] lays before the Senate an elaborate dispatch from Louisville, which is a complete exoneration of me; a statement by those gentlemen who are used as authority for these newspaper articles, that they had never mentioned my name at all in that connection.

That amounts to all the vindication that anybody need desire, a retraction of the basis of this statement; and I will say, therefore, to the Senate, that it is with the Senate now to do just as their own good judgment may dictate; and I have but one word further to say, and that is to thank, with a grateful, warm heart, those gentlemen with whom I have served, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and all the rest for their kindly expressions of confidence in me; not forgetting the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] the chairman of the Finance Committee, with whom I served twenty years ago in the other House, and my distinguished friend from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.] Their words of confidence and kindness will never be forgotten as long as memory lives with me.

With this statement I am perfectly willing to let the Senate dispose of this subject as it pleases, agreeing entirely with the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Minnesota that that branch of the matter which was brought forward as an amendment should be fully and thoroughly investigated. So far as I am personally concerned the disclaimer from Kentucky is very satisfactory to me, and the matter may be disposed of as the Senate now think fitting.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him, does he not believe that a resolution will be offered by the Senator from Minnesota covering the whole ground which will really reach everything?

Mr. VOORHEES. Undoubtedly it will cover every phase of this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Kansas moved to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought that was withdrawn.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; I did not withdraw it. I offered the motion not formally, but with the intention to dispose in that way of the resolution.

Mr. FERRY. Before the vote is taken, then, in order to explain myself, I wish to say that I shall vote against the indefinite postponement, because I prefer that the Senate should vote directly upon the resolution of the Senator from Indiana. I shall vote against the indefinite postponement, and then vote against the resolution of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let the resolution be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as originally introduced.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution as offered by Mr. VOORHEES yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

DR. A. SIDNEY TEBBS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The business on the Calendar will be taken up under the Anthony rule. The first case will be stated.

The consideration of the bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. ROLLINS to refer the bill and pending amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this question the yeas and nays were ordered yesterday.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon this vote with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] I should vote in favor of referring, and he would vote against it.

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. SHERMAN, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called.) I am paired with my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] to-day, with leave to transfer the pair. By arrangement it has been transferred on this vote to Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am therefore at liberty to vote.

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. LOGAN'S name was called.) The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is paired on this matter, by a transfer of pairs, with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] I am paired generally with Mr. LOGAN, but a transfer has been made, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is at liberty to vote.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. JONAS, (when Mr. PENDLETON'S name was called.) The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If present, the Senator from Ohio would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN, (when his name was called.) I again repeat that I am paired generally with my colleague, [Mr. PENDLETON,] but on this vote my colleague is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ROLLINS. I was paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] but I have the right to transfer the pair, which I have done, to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If the Senator from Massachusetts were present he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Aldrich,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell,

So the motion to refer was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be called.

Mr. HAMPTON. Does the vote just adopted carry with it the bill as well as the amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It carries the bill and all the amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 357) granting a pension to Horace S. Spear.

Mr. INGALLS. There is an adverse report on that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 449) for the relief of William B. Whiting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported adversely and will be passed over.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] who made the adverse report in the Whiting case is making some further investigation in regard to the claim, and I desire, and he assents to it, that the bill retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does that. When a bill is simply passed over in this manner it does not go to the foot of the Calendar, unless there is a special objection to its consideration.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1438) to equalize the pay of the officers of the Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill having been reported adversely, will be passed over.

EDWARD K. WINSHIP.

The bill (S. No. 97) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Acting Assistant Paymaster Edward K. Winship, United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the accounting officers of the Treasury in settling the accounts of Edward K. Winship, acting assistant paymaster, United States Navy, to credit him with all stoppages charged against him, amounting to $5,098.15.

Mr. SHERMAN. We ought to hear the report.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following, submitted by Mr. JONES, of Florida, March 22:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred bill S. No. 97, report as follows:

Edward K. Winship was appointed in 1862 an acting assistant paymaster in the United States Navy, and served in that capacity continuously until 1864, when he resigned and rendered his final accounts for settlement. Fourth Auditor Tabor says of Mr. Winship's accounts, under date of June 4, 1878: "Your accounts were always well kept and promptly rendered."

Years after their final rendition these accounts were audited, and when so audited checkages, errors, and discrepancies were found against him amounting to $5,098, for which amount the United States have proceeded to judgment against Mr. Winship on his bond, and it is to be relieved from this judgment, and to have the accounting officers authorized to settle his accounts, that the bill referred to is before the Senate.

Your committee find that Mr. Winship, in the two years he served as acting assistant paymaster, was on duty on the supply ship Massachusetts, and engaged in furnishing all manner of supplies, including large sums of money, to the various vessels of our blockading fleet; that he was compelled to pass over to the paymasters of the various vessels, in the hurried passage of his ship, packages of money amounting to large sums, as well as stores of every kind and description needed by our blockading squadron, and that his accommodations on board ship were inadequate for the duties he was compelled to perform. His disbursements, in money alone, amounted to near two million dollars, and, quoting the language of Auditor Tabor, in the letter above referred to, "Your expenditures on said ship, in money, clothing, small-stores, and provisions were exceedingly large, and that you were doing duty both as paymaster and as storekeeper."

Your committee are of the opinion that no adequate protection was afforded Mr. Winship against the great risk he was compelled to take, and that the chances are largely that loss was occasioned by money passing from him to some one else, in some of his numerous transactions, without proper voucher. It is sixteen years since Mr. Winship rendered his accounts, and in the judgment of the committee the relief asked for ought to be granted.

Your committee are largely induced to the above conclusion from the very high character of the gentleman seeking this relief. He resigned his position in the Navy to accept that of cashier of the Philadelphia United States sub-treasury, where he served considerable time. His accounts and his conduct in that position were faultless. We find from inquiry at the Treasury no suspicion attaches to Mr. Winship, and we believe it is fair to say that this loss, in the opinion of the committee, is without negligence or criminality on his part, and we recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN G. ROBINSON.

The bill (S. No. 648) for the relief of William G. Ford, administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the claim of William G. Ford, administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased, for the interest of the American legatees of Robinson, which were not provided for in the award of the mixed commission, under the treaty of Washington of the date of September 24, 1873, shall be referred to the Court of Claims, relieved from the bar of the statute of limitations. The Court of Claims is authorized to receive as evidence, at its discretion, the testimony already taken by said mixed commission in the case, as though taken over again; and either party may take further and additional testimony, under the order and rules of the court, as in other cases; but before final judgment shall be rendered Ford shall duly execute, according to law, a new administration bond, in such penalty and with such sureties as the court shall deem sufficient and approve.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there a report? The bill does not show what the claim is for.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The report was made by the present Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the bill does not state what it is about. The report had better be read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well; it is not long.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. TELLER March 22:

The Committee on Claims, which has had under consideration the bill (S. No. 648) for the relief of William G. Ford, administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

This case was reported favorably from this committee during the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress.

The committee readopt that report, as follows:

"It appears from the depositions taken and certain record evidence submitted to the mixed commission that John G. Robinson was a British subject resident in the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, and was engaged in the business of a cotton broker, doing a business of from 100,000 to 120,000 bales annually for many years prior to 1863, and up to the time of his death in 1869.

"That on the 4th of May, 1862, the following order was issued and published in the city of New Orleans:

"'[General Orders, No. 22.]

"'HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,

"'New Orleans, May 4, 1862.

"'The commanding general of the department having been informed that rebellious, lying, and desperate men have represented, and are now representing, to the honest planters and good people of the State of Louisiana that the United States Government, by its forces, have come here to confiscate and destroy their crops of cotton and sugar, it is hereby ordered to be made known, by publication in all the newspapers in this city, that all cargoes of cotton and sugar shall receive the safe conduct of the forces of the United States, and boats bringing them from beyond the lines of the United States forces may be allowed to return in safety, after a reasonable delay, if their owners so desire: Provided, They bring no passengers except the owners and managers of said boat and of the property so conveyed, and no other merchandise except provisions, of which such boats are requested to bring a full supply for the benefit of the poor of this city.

"'By command of Major-General Butler.

"'GEORGE C. STRONG,

"'Assistant Adjutant-General.'

"And on the 16th February, 1863, the following order was issued and published in the same city:

"'CUSTOM-HOUSE, NEW ORLEANS,

"'Collector's Office, February 16, 1863.

"'The United States military and other authorities at New Orleans permit cotton to be received here from beyond the United States military lines, and such cotton is exempt from seizure or confiscation. An order is in my hands from Major-General Banks approving and directing the policy. The only condition imposed is that cotton or other produce must not be bought with specie.

* * * * * * *

"'GEORGE S. DENISON,

"'Special Agent of the Treas. Dep't, and Acting Col. of Customs.

"'Approved.

"'D. G. FARRAGUT, Rear-Admiral.'

"It further appears that the said John G. Robinson purchased from one Robert B. Hurt, of Madison County, Tennessee, two hundred and thirty-eight bales of cotton, which were invoiced by the said Hurt to the said Robinson, and the purchase-money receipted for by the said Hurt, at Ponchatoula, Louisiana, on the 7th day of March, 1863, and that said cotton was put on two schooners, the Alcyon and General Worth, at Owl Bayou, in Louisiana, about six miles from Ponchatoula, consigned by the said Hurt to the said Robinson at New Orleans, and bills of lading taken for the same, on the 20th March, 1863; and on the morning of the 21st March, 1863, the officers of the said two schooners were taken prisoners, and the cotton seized by the United States military authorities and taken to New Orleans, where the cotton was sold, and the proceeds held by the authorities of the United States.

"It further appears that immediately after the seizure of this cotton the said Robinson applied to the British consul at New Orleans, who, with the said Robinson, made several applications to the military authorities at New Orleans, first to restore the possession of the cotton to the said Robinson before it was sold, and after the sale to pay to the said Robinson the proceeds, all of which failed, however; and on the 6th January, 1864, the consul made it a subject of a special communication to Lord Lyons, the minister plenipotentiary, &c., of Great Britain at Washington, detailing the facts and sending to the minister the bills of lading and invoice of the cotton; and on the 29th January, 1864, Lord Lyons transmitted the papers to Mr. Seward, the then Secretary of State, asking that Mr. Robinson be paid the value of said cotton. On the 10th February, 1864, Mr. Seward informed Lord Lyons that 'I have commended the case to the attention of the Secretary of War.' And from this time until the death of the said Robinson in 1869, it was a matter of correspondence between the British minister and the Department of State; but the War Department appears never to have acted upon the claim further than to suggest, in 1867, that a remedy would probably be found in the Court of Claims.

"In 1869 the said Robinson died, leaving a will, by which he gave one-fourth of his estate to his brother, William Robinson, and one-fourth to his sister, Mary G. Baker, each residing in England, and one-fourth each to two American citizens resident in New Orleans, and soon thereafter William Robinson died.

"William G. Ford administered upon the estate, and in March, 1872, filed before the mixed commission on British and American claims, under the twelfth article of the treaty of May 8, 1871, a claim for $88,260, more or less, being the proceeds of the sale of the said two hundred and thirty-eight bales of cotton. The claim was vigorously and ably contested by the attorney for the United States upon the ground of want of jurisdiction, want of title to the cotton in Robinson, regularity and legality of the administration, &c.; but after a full hearing, on the 24th September, 1873, the commission made the following award:

"'William G. Ford, administrator, &c., vs. The United States. No. 328.

"'We award the sum of $29,638 to be paid in gold by the Government of the United States to the Government of her Britannic Majesty, in respect of so much of the above claim as relates to the interest of Mary G. Barker, or her representatives, under the will of John G. Robinson, deceased, bearing date October 8, 1858.

"'L. CORTI.

"'RUSSELL GURNEY,

"'Commissioners.'

"No opinion was filed by the commission, but from the points made in the case it is clear that the award was based upon a recognition of the justice of the claim and the right of Ford, as administrator, to prosecute it, and that the petition was dismissed without prejudice, so far as the interests of the American legatees were concerned, for want of jurisdiction. William Robinson, one of the legatees in England, having died a short time after the testator, was not mentioned in the award. Before the creation of the mixed commission John G. Robinson made an earnest and continuous effort to collect this claim through the agency of the British minister, but without avail. The administrator, after the death of Robinson, believing it to be a proper case for the mixed commission, filed it there, and the commission awarded relief as to the legatee, who was a British subject, but dismissed as to the American legatees for want of jurisdiction. It was then too late for the administrator to sue in the Court of Claims to recover what is due, if anything, the two American legatees. Hence he now asks authority to commence suit in said court, relieved from the bar of the statute of limitations, and the committee is of opinion that under the circumstances of the case it should be granted.

"The committee finds, upon examination, that this claim was considered by the House Committee on Claims of both the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses, and a favorable report in each Congress. The bill passed the House on the 5th May, 1876, but was not considered by the Senate. In the Forty-fourth Congress there was an adverse report by the Senate Committee on Claims, but upon a careful examination of that report the committee is satisfied that it is based upon erroneous conclusions as to several material facts.

"Believing, as the committee does, that there is merit in this claim, and that if allowed to test the questions of law and fact in the Court of Claims nothing will be allowed by the court unless the case is clearly made out, the committee report the bill back, with the recommendation that it pass."

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like the Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, to state as briefly as he can the substance of this report, that we may understand it a little more distinctly than from the reading of the report by the Secretary. I think he can state it briefly, perhaps.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The facts of the case are these: John G. Robinson was a British subject resident in the city of New Orleans. He was engaged prior to the war in that city in business as a cotton broker. He continued to reside in that city, and continued engaged in that business until his death in 1869. In 1863, after the Federal forces had taken possession of New Orleans, the two orders which are included in the report were made by order of General Butler. Under his orders persons were at liberty to bring into the city of New Orleans provisions and cotton. This Mr. Robinson purchased 238 bales of cotton in Tennessee and shipped that amount on board two vessels in the upper part of Louisiana. Before the vessels reached New Orleans, however, they were seized by the revenue officers and the cotton was sent to New York and sold and the proceeds went into the Treasury. Mr. Robinson, being a British subject, applied to Lord Lyons, the then British minister in Washington, for relief. The matter was made the subject of correspondence between the American and British Governments. The justice of the claim was admitted by Mr. Seward, at that time our Secretary of State. The matter was afterward referred to the British and American mixed commission under the treaty of 1871. In the mean time Mr. Robinson——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not announce the arrival of two o'clock, supposing the bill would be finished in a moment.

Mr. HARRIS. I was going to ask unanimous consent to continue it, as the report had been read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Part of the claim has been allowed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Part of the claim has been allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin unless it is insisted on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I called for the explanation. I have read the report, and I am not disposed to ask for any further explanation

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If no further explanation is desired, I will not say anything more.

Mr. HARRIS. I carefully examined the case, and made the report two years ago. I do not think there can be any doubt about it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NUMBER OF MEN IN THE NAVY.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up the next bill in order on the Calendar. I shall be called out of the Senate to-morrow on special business, and the bill will occupy but a few moments' time, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the next bill on the Calendar, though the hour of two o'clock has passed? If there be no objection the Chair will presume that unanimous consent is granted.

The Acting Secretary read the bill (S. No. 1529) to amend section 1417 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the Navy. It proposes to amend the section by striking out the words "eight thousand two hundred and fifty" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "eight thousand seven hundred and fifty."

Mr. COCKRELL. Why is that change?

Mr. ROLLINS. It increases the number of men in the Navy five hundred. The necessity for it will be seen by reading the letter of the head of the Bureau of Equipment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I must object to the consideration of the bill until we have more time to discuss it.

Mr. ROLLINS. I submit that the objection is altogether too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be interposed at any time.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there a written report?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Chair asked consent of the Senate to have the bill called up, and said he would presume consent unless objection was then made. No objection was made.

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to object, but I rise in the interest of the Senate to say, that when the regular order is informally laid aside in this way it may be resumed at any time on the call of any Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection can be interposed after the bill has been called up.

Mr. ROLLINS. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. It stands at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. ROLLINS. It is the first time I have asked such a favor of the Senate during the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be at the head of the Calendar to-morrow morning.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LYNCHBURGH.

Mr. JOHNSTON rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask that the pending order be informally laid aside until I can have the Senate consider a House bill to erect a court-house and public building at Lynchburgh, Virginia, a thing that is very much needed. The bill has passed the House, and been reported favorably by the Senate committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. How many people are there in Lynchburgh?

Mr. JOHNSTON. About twenty-two thousand.

Mr. ROLLINS. I should like to inquire where the bill is.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Here, sir.

Mr. ROLLINS. According to my recollection it was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is a Senate bill on the Calendar reported by the committee. The House bill is in committee yet, I believe.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senate bill and House bill are unlike.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In what respect?

Mr. ROLLINS. Several respects. I object.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House bill has not been reported back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to hear the amendment reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. At the end of section 3 it is proposed to add:

Provided, That no circuit or district judge before whom a cause or question may have been tried or heard in the district or circuit court shall sit on the trial or hearing of such cause or question in the appellate court.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, the question presented by this amendment has been very much considered in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. Up to the constitutional convention of the State of New York held in the year 1846 the judges of the county courts, the supreme court, and the court for the correction of errors, as it was then called, except the senators sitting in the court of errors, were appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; but in the convention of 1846 all those officers were made elective by the people. The fact that they were thus chosen by the popular vote, and likely to be candidates for re-election to the various offices for which they had been chosen, led to an elaborate discussion of this very proposition, whether it was discreet or wise to permit a judge who had once presided at the trial of a case to sit in the court of review when it was being reconsidered upon an appeal or writ of error.

There was a division of sentiment among the members of the bar of New York upon this question. The late Judge Bronson, in one of the leading opinions written by him in the court of appeals, said of the subject, "if a judge be wise enough to discover that he has made an error in his ruling at nisi prius, honest enough to acknowledge the error when he has discovered it, and firm enough to follow his convictions when the error has been disclosed, he is the very best of all persons to sit in review of his decision."

But, Mr. President, this was regarded by the people as a refinement upon the subject, and with great unanimity they adopted, in substance, what is embodied in this amendment, that no judge should sit in review of his own decisions upon error or appeal. Instead of responding to the sentiment of Judge Bronson they responded to the sentiment of another judge of the same State, expressed in more homely but no less vigorous language, that "taking human nature as we find it, a judge who has once made up his opinion in a case is very apt to adhere to it."

There was another consideration which weighed with us, and that was the necessity of having justice so administered, if possible, as that the people would be satisfied with its administration at the earliest possible moment. To illustrate, suppose a case is tried at the circuit and is taken to the general term of the Supreme Court for rehearing, and the judge who presided at the circuit takes part in its determination and the judgment is affirmed. The parties to the action, the public interested in the question, would be prone to say, "If the judge who presided at the circuit had not been there the judgment would not have been affirmed." So that there was an unrest in the public mind growing out of the idea that a judge who had once formed an opinion should be permitted to take further part in the determination of the question. This system, which has been in operation for a great many years in the State of New York, has worked to the entire satisfaction of suitors and of the public.

It is now regarded as one of the wisest provisions in our system that whenever a case is taken from one court to another it shall come before minds that are entirely uncommitted and unprepossessed upon the questions involved.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of this amendment.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired generally with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I am not advised how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I do not know how he would vote, if here, on this question, but I shall withhold my vote. If I were at liberty I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONAS, (when Mr. PENDLETON's name was called.) The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is paired with his colleague, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If here, the Senator [Mr. PENDLETON] would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I am paired on this bill generally with my colleague, [Mr. PENDLETON.] I understand that he, if here, would vote for this amendment; I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 14; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] is next in order. It will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In section 8, line 5, it is proposed to strike out, after the word "judgment," the word "but" and insert "and;" and after the word "shall," in the same line, to strike out "not;" and after the word "proceedings," in line 6, to strike out all down to and including the word "judge," in line 9, as follows: "except in capital cases, unless it is so ordered by the judge who shall allow the writ, nor after a refusal to allow the writ by one such judge shall it be allowed by another judge."

Mr. CALL. The amendment is intended to amend the section so that it will read as follows:

That a writ of error may be sued out of that court from the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal case to such court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment; and such writ shall operate as a stay of proceedings.

That is the reading it is intended to give the section. It is proposed to make the writ suspend the execution of the sentence whenever taken. I think the liberty and the life of a citizen is as important, far more important, than any mere question of property. As the courts are now constituted they are absolute in criminal cases. As the bill proposes to give them power, it vests in the judge of the circuit who grants a writ of error the right to say whether the sentence shall be suspended or not. Of course in capital cases the writ operates as a suspension per se, but in all other cases the sentence goes on for execution.

Now, if a man has the right of appeal and is not to be concluded by one judgment, certainly that right ought to be operative absolutely. It ought to suspend the execution of the sentence. The character which these courts have under the circumstances which have existed since the war is not such that we should vest in them, without the absolute right of appeal or a writ of error, the power to punish criminally. They have been too often the instruments of mere political opinion. Without undertaking to say anything against any particular judge, I say that under the circumstances which have existed and which still exist to some extent the ends of justice are not attained by subjecting a citizen to punishment by the verdict of a partial jury and upon the opinion of a partisan judge, without the right of appeal.

It has been the case always in the history of this country that public opinion has found its way into the courts; it has been the history of all countries. I have heard a great deal said about reverence for the character of the judiciary, about respect for the judges. Well, sir, I am disposed to accord to them a reasonable degree of respect, but I do not see why we should be blind to the facts of history. I think we should guard, and guard with a great deal of care, the liberty and the lives of the people who are subject to judicial power.

I heard yesterday, on the subject of the exclusion of a judge who had sat in the court below from sitting in the court above, a great many arguments urged to the effect that the judge was selected from the best class of persons, subjected to the best influences, and was removed from the reach of the improper influences which affect men in other stations of life. My observation of judicial tribunals, my reading of history, has not led me to the conclusion that the judges are infallible or that they are beyond the reach of political or of party opinion. I am confirmed a good deal in that by the opinions of a very learned and distinguished man who sat in this Senate, and who, while differing very broadly from the opinions which I entertain in many respects, has spoken with a wisdom and a learning upon this subject that commends itself to the enlightened opinion of men everywhere. I read, sir, from Mr. Sumner's speeches the following:

For myself let me say that I hold judges, and especially the Supreme Court of the country, in much respect, but I am too familiar with the history of judicial proceedings to regard them with any superstitious reverence. Judges are but men, and in all ages have shown a full share of human frailty. Alas! alas! the worst crimes of history have been perpetrated under their sanction. The blood of martyrs and of patriots, crying from the ground, summons them to judgment. It was a judicial tribunal which condemned Socrates to drink the fatal hemlock, and which pushed the Saviour barefoot over the pavements of Jerusalem, bending beneath his cross. It was a judicial tribunal which, against the testimony and entreaties of her father, surrendered the fair Virginia as a slave, which arrested the teachings of the great apostle to the Gentiles, and sent him in bonds from Judea to Rome; which, in the name of the old religion, adjudged the saints and fathers of the Christian church to death in all its most dreadful forms, and which afterwards, in the name of the new religion, enforced the tortures of the Inquisition, amidst the shrieks and agonies of its victims, while it compelled Galileo to declare, in solemn denial of the great truth he had disclosed, that the earth did not move round the sun. It was a judicial tribunal which, in France, during the long reign of her monarchs, lent itself to be the instrument of every tyranny, as during the brief reign of terror it did not hesitate to stand forth the unpitying accessory of the unpitying guillotine.

Ay, sir, it was a judicial tribunal in England, surrounded by all the forms of law, which sanctioned every despotic caprice of Henry the Eighth, from the unjust divorce of his queen to the beheading of Sir Thomas More, which lighted the fires of persecution that glowed at Oxford and Smithfield over the cinders of Latimer, Ridley, and John Rogers; which, after elaborate argument, upheld the fatal tyranny of ship-money against the patriot resistance of Hampden; which, in defiance of justice and humanity, sent Sidney and Russell to the block; which persistently enforced the laws of conformity that our Puritan fathers persistently refused to obey; and which afterward, with Jeffries on the bench, crimsoned the pages of English history with massacre and murder—even with the blood of innocent woman. Ay, sir, and it was a judicial tribunal in our own country, surrounded by all the forms of law, which hung witches at Salem—which affirmed the constitutionality of the stamp act, while it admonished "jurors and people" to obey.—Sumner's Speeches, pages 405, 406.

Mr. President, I recognize in that presentation of Charles Sumner a truth applicable to the judiciary everywhere. It is not exempt from the clamors of public opinion; it is not above the reach of political and partisan opinion. It has generally been on the side of tyranny and against the liberties of the people. The great orator and statesman of Massachusetts in the line of history presented facts which the history of our own country attests. I say, then, that as legislators, and I appeal to my brethren in the Senate, we should throw around the citizen's life and his liberty in criminal proceedings the greatest protection that we can. If a writ of error or appeal be allowed, and the sentence be suspended until it is heard again and decided by another court, there is some greater security than where the opinion of a single judge and a jury can be suspended only by the consent of one other judge.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I regret very much that my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL] has introduced this amendment, which, if adopted, I think would be exceedingly mischievous. This bill, if it passes, produces a radical change in many things. For instance, as the law now is, a man can get but one hearing in a case that involves $5,000. By this bill he can get a hearing by an appellate tribunal, which I venture to affirm will be nearly equal to the Supreme Court in all cases, from $500 up. No person who is presented on criminal information, or indicted, can get any hearing at all in the Supreme Court now. By this bill, everybody who is convicted of a criminal offense—and that means misdemeanors as well as the higher grade of offenses—can have an appeal to this appellate court if a writ of error is allowed by the judge. The writ of error may be allowed or it may not be allowed. The case may be such as will not warrant a writ of error. It may be that there should be no stay of proceedings at all; that justice would not require that there should be a stay of proceedings; that the case itself would be of such minor importance that there ought not to be a stay of proceedings; and in a vast number of cases, as revenue cases, it might be very improper that there should be a stay of proceedings.

You must leave discretion somewhere; you must leave it with the judges to decide whether there shall be a stay of proceedings. These judges are to be supposed to be able men. We insert in the bill the provision that the granting of a writ of error shall not per se operate as a stay of proceedings. It is so in every State that I have any knowledge of, it is so everywhere, that the judge who grants the writ has the discretion to say whether it shall operate as a supersedeas or not in a criminal case. The Judiciary Committee in its liberality says the writ "shall not operate as a stay of proceedings, except in capital cases." Of course it operates as a stay of proceedings there, unless the judge so orders. You must trust it to the judge. He has to allow the writ of error, and you must presume that he is possessed of the requisite degree of legal knowledge to decide whether the case comes within the purview of cases in which a stay of proceedings ought to be allowed.

There is another provision here about which it might be well enough to say a word:

> Nor after a refusal to allow the writ by one such judge shall it be allowed by another judge.

That was put in by the Judiciary Committee after full consideration. In the State of New York a few years ago there was a scandal in regard to the various stays of proceedings in civil cases and in criminal cases. One judge would refuse such an application, and then the applicant would go to another judge and he would grant it; so that it got to be in the time of Judge Barnard and other judges a scandal to the whole country. That has been stopped in the State of New York. We thought it proper to put this provision here as a guard and protection, although we suppose that no judge appointed under this act would do it.

I really believe that the Senate would be doing a very unwise thing to adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Illinois had the appointment of these judges, or if he were the judge himself, I should be perfectly satisfied to leave the question in his hands; but unless we are sure that the judge to whom the application for the writ is made is a man in all respects above and beyond the reach of partisan opinion or prejudice or improper motives, and is possessed of the capacity and the ability as a jurist and a lawyer to apply the law properly, it affords little or no protection to the accused, and is in effect saying that a man convicted of crime shall have the right of hearing upon alleged errors of law provided the opinion of the first judge to whom he submits the application shall affirm that there is a matter of error of law in the record. I can see no reason pertinent to the protection of the person on trial against an oppressive use of judicial power in thus limiting and qualifying his right to revision of errors and a delay of punishment until such revision is had.

In my own observation I have known juries deliberately selected for the purpose of preventing an impartial trial. In view of the particular circumstances of this country, of the character of judiciary, which has been appointed, as we know, for political and partisan reasons, judges, some of whom have been influenced by the desire of promoting the success of their political party, the public opinion of the country being advised of that fact, to say now that in the case of a trial and of a trial for a political offense the judges selected because of their known partisanship, selected for the very reason that they have been identified with particular political views, shall be allowed the absolute power of convicting a man, depriving him of his liberty, is in my judgment a grave imputation upon the system of adjudication which is proposed.

I therefore have proposed this amendment. I have seen in my own life two boys of fourteen years of age convicted and sent to the penitentiary for an alleged conspiracy to deprive a man of civil rights secured under the Constitution of the United States, and in a case where, in the judgment of the lawyers and in my own judgment and opinion, there was abundant error in the record. I have seen in a record of that kind these children torn from their parents and sent to prison, there being no means whatever for their release except the pardoning power of the President.

I think in any case there ought to be an absolute right of appeal or writ of error, and that it should operate per se as a supersedeas under the circumstances which have existed throughout a large section of this country. Such a provision can do no harm at least; and I can see no reason why, under the widely extended range of Federal jurisdiction, under the unrestrained power which the laws give the Federal judges of construing the most innocent acts of life into crimes, there should not be special care to secure the right of revision and suspension of execution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I cannot, for the life of me, see how any person living where the Senator from Florida does should not be in favor of the provision of the bill in relation to criminal matters. We cannot go further and say that every case that is tried below shall be appealed to the intermediate court, and that is really the meaning of the Senator's amendment. This proposed law must be executed through instrumentalities, and the instrumentalities are the judges.

I believe that now, seventeen years after the war, judges satisfactory to everybody can be appointed in all parts of the country. I hope so, I believe so, I trust so; but in any event we must trust to the judges or some of them. There are a supreme court judge and three circuit judges to be appointed. You must leave it to the judge to decide whether there shall be a stay of proceedings or not. Otherwise you make really a town-meeting of the criminal business, and nothing else. He must decide it; and we have left it in that way for him to say whether there shall be a stay of proceedings. In half the cases there may be no necessity for it, and to have it go up in the way proposed would fill the docket of the intermediate court, when there would be no occasion for it, for when the case got there it would be found that there was no point in the case whatever. Such a practice does not prevail in any State in this Union.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Illinois to answer me this question. Suppose that under his bill there should be a writ of error and an appeal——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is no appeal, only a writ of error in criminal cases.

Mr. CALL. We will call it a writ of error.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There must be a writ of error.

Mr. CALL. It goes up to the appellate court, and the sentence continuing to be executed the court decides that there is error in the record and sets aside the judgment or sentence below. Why should that man have been imprisoned for that length of time under an erroneous judgment? Is it not better that the records of the court should be increased and the judges be put to some inconvenience than that innocent people convicted improperly in the court below should be confined and deprived of their liberty?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The judge who tried the case is not the person that the criminal would be supposed to apply to for a writ of error. He goes to another judge. You must suppose that that judge knows the law, and if there is any question in any human probability by which the case should be reversed or modified above, he would grant a stay of proceedings; of course he would not do so otherwise. The bill proceeds on the theory that the judges who are to be appointed will be possessed of reasonable judicial knowledge, and that they will be possessed of the common instincts by which we are all governed, to let every man accused of crime have a fair hearing. You must trust the responsibility somewhere. The judge who tried the case would probably not be the proper person to apply to for the writ of error, but there are to be five other judges of the court, and you can apply to any one of them.

Mr. CALL. This is a very serious matter; it concerns a large number of people. I do not wish to say anything invidious against the character of any particular judge, and I do not wish to be understood as alluding to the judges in my own State in my remarks; but the point in the matter is simply this: a man is on trial, and, we believe, in a great many cases is improperly convicted by judges who know they ought not to have so applied the law, and by juries who have been carefully selected for the purpose of conviction. He applies to a judge of similar political feeling, interested, as was the judge before whom he was tried, in promoting by the use of his judicial power the success of a political party—I do not care which party it is—and he refuses the application.

In some parts of this country the people have no confidence in the judicial integrity of some of the men who exercise judicial power. The honorable Senator from Illinois possesses the confidence and respect of all the people of this country. Everybody would accord to him unlimited and absolute acknowledgment of propriety of intention, of humanity, of wisdom and learning in the discharge of either judicial or political functions.

But it is not so everywhere. The public opinion of the country regards some of the judges, in whom probably the discharge of these functions will be vested, as men capable of any prostitution of judicial power. As honest men, with the best judgments that they possess, observing carefully the judicial proceedings of which the newspapers give us intelligence, the country is convinced of that fact. They believe that there are judges who would not hesitate to convict innocent men for their own purposes. Therefore in preference to having men convicted by such means held in prison until the judgment is reversed by the instrumentality which the Senator from Illinois proposes to create in this bill, why not provide that they shall not be imprisoned, that they shall not be punished until the superior court upon the writ of error has examined the proceedings. I ask the question again is it not better, if the upper court shall find there was error and set aside the judgment, that the man shall not be imprisoned and punished under an erroneous or unlawful judgment? This much at least might be conceded to the people in favor of that liberty and equality of which we hear so much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CALL.]

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] Therefore I decline to vote.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RANSOM, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I ask leave to withdraw my vote. I voted under a misapprehension. I am paired on this amendment with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. ROLLINS. I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] on political questions, but I suppose this is not a political question. Therefore I will vote "nay." [Mr. CALL rose.] If the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] thinks I am in error in the matter I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not withdraw my vote upon the ground that this was a political question at all, for manifestly it is not.

Mr. ROLLINS. I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 3, line 11, before the word "court," I move to insert the word "supreme;" after the word "court," to strike out the words "at each term thereof;" before the word "succeeding," in the same line, to insert the word "next;" and after the word "term" to insert "of said court of appeals;" so as to read:

By an order of the Supreme Court to serve for the next succeeding term of said court of appeals.

Striking out the words following:

The designation to be made so far as practicable in rotation.

The purpose of the amendment is to have the district judges who may comprise in part this court of appeals selected by the Supreme Court of the United States instead of by the court of appeals itself, and also to strike out that feature of the bill which provides for the rotation as far as may be practicable of the different district judges upon this appellate court, my reason being that it is our duty to provide that the best talent, the largest experience, and highest character shall be selected out of the district judges for the court of appeals, and that they shall not be compelled or permitted to rotate upon the bench.

There are certain judges of the district court of the United States in the different parts of this country who are known to the Supreme Court of the United States as able jurists, men who have high character and have established it by a series of years of able adjudications. It is our duty to supply the very best material we can get upon this court of appeals, and the Supreme Court being the tribunal which best understands the qualifications of the district judges, I assume it to be the best tribunal to make the selection, and a far better tribunal than the court of appeals itself.

I further contend that it would be an injury rather than a benefit to compel a rotation in the selection of the district judges. I want the authority for presiding over this court to come from the highest source that we can get next to the President. I want it to be understood by the country, by the judge who is elevated to this position upon the court of appeals, that it is done in consideration of his high character and great ability. I do not wish it to be understood that merely because a man holds a commission on a district bench, therefore he is in rotation entitled to go upon the court of appeals, and preside, it may be, for a single term.

The qualifications of a judge of a court of appeals must necessarily be higher than the qualifications of a judge merely of a court of nisi prius, and the experience which two district judges would reach upon the bench of the court of appeals after several years of comparison of opinions and investigation of causes in connection with the associate justice of the Supreme Court and the three circuit judges who would with him comprise the court, would be very valuable to him and to the country.

It is not the mere fact that we want to get a membership of the court—somebody to make a quorum. The selection should be made only with reference to the man's abilities, and he should be allowed to be kept upon that bench a sufficient length of time to accomplish himself as far as possible in all that is necessary for the discharge of the high duties confided to him.

It must be remembered that we are taking from the Supreme Court of the United States a large part of its existing jurisdiction and conferring it upon these nine courts of Federal appeals. We therefore ought to strive to get upon these nine courts the very best material that we can find in the whole judicial establishment of the country. The Supreme Court stands far above and independent of the court of appeals and of the district and circuit judges. It would be likely to make a selection more with reference to the accomplishments of the judges and their fitness for the place than the court of appeals itself would be.

I think it is a much safer plan to adopt the amendment I have proposed to the bill than to allow the court of appeals to fill up its numbers by appointment, and especially under the system of rotation. We have just voted down an amendment requiring the judges of the circuit court to rotate. I do not know any good reason for voting down that amendment, unless it may be that some parts of the country are not willing to take the judges that have been imposed upon some other parts of the country. I have frequently heard matters of this kind discussed in regard to my own State, where measures were up for the purpose of compelling the judges to rotate upon the circuits, and the protest was usually entered, "You have got some very bad judges in some of the circuits in Alabama, and we do not wish to spread those around over the community at large; confine them to the places for which they have been elected, make your people responsible at the ballot-box for the character of the men they elect, and let them have those they have chosen." We are not quite within the reach of any relief on this question in many parts of the Southern States. There are some judges in Southern States who in Northern States would not be allowed to preside in a court, particularly if they behaved there as they do with us. I do not know but that the old English practice of dragging them by the heels would be applied if they should undertake it.

Such men, as I argued the other day, are not fit to go upon the appellate court bench; they were never selected with reference to their fitness for such high offices, and when we allow the court, as it will do in the practice of a certain comity, to go around in a circle, to take judge after judge, and put these men on for a single term as a mere compliment to them, we shall put the interests of the people and the right administration of our judicial system in jeopardy by such a course as that. I contend that the law should be so framed as that every time we shall get the best material upon it, and we ought to have the selection made by that court which stands above all other courts in the country.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this bill is not designed to correct temporary evils in the administration of justice of which any portion of the country may justly or unjustly complain, but to establish as far as possible an additional or supplemental system to that already in force for the purpose of correcting difficulties of which all complain.

It is obvious that the present courts are totally inadequate to perform the duties that devolve upon them. While I sympathize with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Alabama in regard to the propriety of correcting evils in certain localities if they are admitted to exist, yet I respectfully submit to him that arguments addressed to this bill, which is intended to apply to the whole country and for all time, ought not to be controlled by mere temporary and local considerations.

The design is to make this court of appeals consist of the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit and the circuit judges thereof, and two of the district judges to be designated by an order of the court at each term thereof to hold for the succeeding term; and because there have been wrongs committeed in the administration of justice in certain localities, the Senator from Alabama insists that the whole scope of the bill shall be changed, and that the definitions which it contains shall be so modified as to affect different sections of the country injuriously where no such grounds of complaint obtain.

Of course the Supreme Court is the highest tribunal recognized by the statutes and by the Constitution, but in the attempt that is made in this bill to localize the administration of justice, to offer tribunals where cases can be decided in a forum near to the person and near to the acts about which litigation is invoked, where is the justice of referring the constitution of this court of appeals back to the Supreme Court sitting here in Washington?

I fail to see any strength in the argument advanced by the Senator from Alabama as bearing upon this question. The judges of the court, as provided in the bill, are the proper persons to designate the district judges who shall sit for the purpose of making up the court of appeals before whom these cases are to come. The objection made by the Senator against the practice of rotation appears to me to be without foundation, because the purpose is to so distribute the labors that will fall upon the court as to make the whole system uniform and compel all the judges, who are assumed to be competent men, and just men, and patriotic men, to bear their share of the burdens that are imposed by the administration of justice.

I submit to the Senator, admitting all he says to be true about the wrongs that the people of the South or of certain portions of the South have suffered, why should the entire scheme of the bill, which is intended to apply to the whole country and for all time to come, be bent and distorted and twisted and warped out of shape to enable people of a certain locality to escape from evils of which they complain but which we may hope soon hereafter will be remedied by the ordinary methods of justice?

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question before he sits down?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator if under this bill a district judge, we will say for the district of Illinois, may not be transferred to a district in some other State?

Mr. INGALLS. Of course a district judge from one State can be transferred to another State in the same circuit.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the point of my inquiry.

Mr. INGALLS. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore he may go from one State to another?

Mr. INGALLS. Although it is not defined as distinctly as I should like to see it in the bill, the purpose of the framers of the bill was to limit the selection of the district judges to the circuit where the court of appeals sits; but the circuit embracing more than one State, of course the circuit judges can call upon the district judges of different States in the same circuit.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore a district judge in the State of Virginia, for instance, may be sent to North Carolina, with the laws of which State he is not at all familiar?

Mr. INGALLS. Supposing North Carolina and Virginia are, as I suppose them to be, in the same circuit.

Mr. BUTLER. One of the arguments presented against my amendment yesterday, providing for rotation in the circuit judges, was that they were necessarily local, and that therefore a circuit judge familiarizing himself with the laws of his circuit would not be at home going into some other circuit embracing different States. Now, I understand the Senator to say that a district judge hitherto confined to one State, and having familiarized himself with the laws of that State, may be transferred to an entirely different State.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Oh, no; that was not the purpose of the bill at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Does it not have that effect? The Senator from Kansas, I understand, says that is the effect.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. In the same circuit.

Mr. INGALLS. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; but the circuits are composed of several States, and now Senators are applying the very same doctrine to the district judges which they denied yesterday as applicable to the circuit judges. If the reason prevails for the transfer of district judges from one State to another, so much the stronger does it exist when it comes to the circuit judges.

Mr. McMILLAN. The argument of the Senator from South Carolina in regard to circuit judges, under his amendment yesterday, embraced the whole United States, and the circuit judges would traverse every circuit in the country. The district judges are those which are embraced within the circuit. They cannot go out of it. That principle is as nearly local as can be enforced in a general bill of this character.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand that, a circuit being composed of five or six States, a district judge may go into each one of those States?

Mr. INGALLS. That is evidently the effect of the bill, and that is the law now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is the law now.

Mr. BUTLER. A district judge may be transferred from one State to another?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir; in his circuit. That is the law now, and has been for twenty years.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Kansas took an illustration that I used for the purpose of proving my argument, and he made the argument to rest entirely in the illustration. My point is that the judges of the district courts to be selected on the court of appeals ought to be selected with reference to the permanency of the position, first, of course, for their talents, abilities, character, and long service on the bench, and then that they should not be selected to rotate as far as may be practicable according to the language of this bill. I do not understand that on a high court of appeals like this we want a judge to come directly from the circuit and sit one term and at the next term have another judge in rotation. We should be apt to get an admixture in that way of a bad element if there should be any, but would not be likely to obtain the good element so as to make use of it in the composition of the court of appeals. It certainly is very much better that we should have the best judges selected, and that after they have been selected the Supreme Court should keep them in the position as long as they think they are competent and better fitted for that station than any one else.

Why should the Supreme Court be resorted to for the selection of these judges? Because it is a court which stands apart from the intermediate court of appeals. The Supreme Court owes no comity to intermediate courts of appeal or to any member upon the bench particularly, and the judges of the Supreme Court would be very apt to select those men from the district bench who would make the best officers to preside in the intermediate court of appeal.

I submit that my proposition does not twist the bill out of shape at all; it does not alter the general scheme of the bill; it is the amendment of one solitary item in it. I wish that the Supreme Court of the United States shall select these two district judges instead of the court of intermediate appeals, believing that they will do better for the country than the court of intermediate appeals would do, being less under the constraint of courtesy or comity, and that in all respects we should have a much better court of appeals than if we intrusted the intermediate court to select its own membership.

I do not much believe in giving the power to any tribunal of that kind to fill up its membership by selection. I think there is some danger in allowing a thing of that sort to take place. A judge of the circuit court, knowing the opinions of a judge of the district court upon certain questions where he has committed himself, and where he may have pride of opinion, wants to have that district judge selected to go upon the appellate bench, and it is easy enough for him to manage it; and it would be done in some instances. Whether it should ever be done at all, this is a proper guard to place here in the bill. Remove the temptation, and let that court which has the final arbitrament of all these cases, when they come within the range of its jurisdiction, and which stands supreme above all the other courts of the country, designate the men from time to time that, in the opinion of that court, would be competent men to preside over the intermediate court of appeals.

It would be a great compliment to a judge of the district court to be selected by the Supreme Court of the United States for such work as this, and he would strive to prove himself honorably and rightly entitled to the distinction; but if it is to be a matter of rotation, and a judge is to go upon the bench according to fixed principles of law, and he must go whether qualified or not, "as far as practicable," says the bill, "in rotation," then you compel us to take judges sometimes that are bad men, and we must necessarily take them when we know them to be such. The court has no power to exclude them. There is a little too much Democracy in that provision even to suit my taste. I claim to be a pretty fair Democrat, but I am not in favor of running the principles of the Democratic party into the judiciary except upon constitutional questions. It is not likely that we shall have a very large element out of these eighteen judges appointed from the Democratic party. I venture that the honorable Senator from Illinois will not now undertake to say that he believes one-half of the eighteen judges will be selected from the Democratic party.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If I were the appointing power, I would appoint one-half.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been the misfortune of this country for the last fifteen or twenty years that the honorable Senator from Illinois has not been the appointing power.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have great faith that the judges who are to be appointed will prove satisfactory to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt the strength of the honorable Senator's faith is very great, but it is not of that sort to remove mountains, and these are mountains fastened upon us which we cannot remove. I was in hope when I put the question to the honorable Senator that he would be able to say right out that he knew there would be something like a division of these officers between the different parties in this country.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it quite likely that if we were to postpone action upon this bill for three or four years perhaps we might have the pleasure of having the appointing power in the person of the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MORGAN. In such a case as that we should have it as nearly equally divided as possible.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator bows his acknowledgments, but does not accept the compliment.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt the Senator from Illinois will freely say, however, that he does favor the selection of these eighteen judges if we pass the bill through both Houses, with some reference to a division between parties.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have just stated that if I were the appointing power I would divide them. What more would you have me state?

Mr. MORGAN. You put it upon a condition which in your own opinion seemed impossible, and I thought I would have the remark without any condition at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have given you that; but I do not want this bill ruined by amendments.

Mr. MORGAN. This bill can be very much improved by amendment, if it did come from the Judiciary Committee, and the lawyers of this country will understand that after they have read it with care. A man, I care not how great he is, is always the poorest judge of his own children, and it will be found upon close, critical analysis of this bill that there are some very severe clauses in it which need amendment. I do not wish to destroy the bill. I want to vote for a substitute for it which I think is a better plan. I announced the other day that I was not opposed to the bill because it created a court of intermediate appeals. When the Congress of the United States shall pass beyond to the proposition of reducing the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, which I think is the very proposition we ought to address our attention to now, and comes to consider the means by which justice can be more conveniently and speedily administered, I would take the Senator's bill in the absence of a better provision; but this bill has in my opinion a dangerous provision in it, the one to which I have addressed my amendment, and the words ought to be stricken out as I have proposed. You compel us by law to take men upon the appellate bench merely because they are on the district bench, without any reference to their qualifications for presiding in the appellate court, for you say that they must rotate as far as practicable. I wish to strike that out. If the court of intermediate appeals must make a selection of the district judges who are to preside in that court, let it be done without the compulsory arrangement that it shall be by rotation. Let that court have some option of selecting the men who are to go upon the court of appeals.

I think I have set before the Senate sufficient reasons why some men in this country ought not to be intrusted with power like this. I cannot vote for any bill which contains any increase of the power of those particular men. The bill, as you have got it, compels me, if I shall vote for it, to increase the power of men who I know are unworthy and incompetent for this place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If there be no further amendment to be proposed to the text of the bill, the next amendment is the substitute proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] moves to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert what will be read at the desk.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It was read yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment was read yesterday and will not be read again unless desired.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President——

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Louisiana before he proceeds with his remarks. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, as is known by all the members of the Judiciary Committee, and I have been struggling ever since I have been a member of that committee for something to that effect. But the Senator from Louisiana will encounter one trouble: he offers his amendment as a substitute for the bill. His proposition looks to defining and withdrawing jurisdiction. The most of the bill now under consideration is a bill organizing tribunals. If we strike out all the bill and enact his amendment we shall have no courts organized, but shall simply limit and modify the present jurisdiction. I suggest to the Senator instead of offering his amendment as a substitute, that he offer it as a separate section, and when that is done, at the proper time I shall make some remarks upon it.

Mr. JONAS. I have no objection to the proposition.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered (as the Senator from Arkansas has suggested) is for the purpose of diminishing the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, and necessarily of the Supreme Court, in case of appeal, which enlarged jurisdiction, I think, has brought the present enormous glut of business upon the Federal courts which the judges seem unable to grapple with. The proper course is to go to the root of the evil, and to ascertain whether the jurisdiction of the United States courts has been providently increased, whether the amendments which have been enacted in the last few years, and which have increased their business to such enormous proportions, were wisely adopted, and whether it is not better for us to go back in our work of legislation and to withdraw a portion of the jurisdiction which has been conferred upon the circuit courts by the amendments to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

The first great opening of the flood-gates was by the passage of the act of March 3, 1875, the first section of which I propose to amend. The section of the judiciary act, amended by that act, and which, although no longer the law, is retained as section 629 of the Revised Statutes, reads:

> The circuit courts shall have original jurisdiction as follows:
> First. Of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $500, and an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the State where it is brought and a citizen of another State: Provided, That no circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange.

The act of 1875, to which I have referred, re-enacted this section of the judiciary act, (section 629, Revised Statutes,) with this amendment:

> Nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon if no assignment had been made, except in cases of promissory notes negotiable by the law merchant and bills of exchange.

Thus directly changing the exception contained in the original act, and admitting the assignee or the payee of a promissory note to sue in a circuit court, whether the original payee could have brought his suit there or not. The result of this was to cause a large majority of suits upon commercial paper to be brought in the United States courts, which formerly had jurisdiction of but a very limited number of them.

Under the former law, if the payee of a promissory note or the drawee of a bill of exchange was a citizen of the same State as the maker or drawer of that note or bill of exchange he could not sue in the United States courts necessarily, neither could the assignee holding by his indorsement. Consequently, until the passage of this act in 1875 but a very limited number of promissory notes or bills of exchange found their way into suit in the United States courts, but after the passage of that act the indorsee of a promissory note could sue in a United States court if he was a citizen of a different State from the maker or indorser of the note, whether the original payee or indorsee could bring suit there or not.

The result of this change has been to increase the jurisdiction of the United States courts in a manifold degree. It has been the means not only of adding an immense amount of legitimate and proper jurisdiction to the United States courts under the law as amended, but it has also been the means of perpetrating legal frauds on the jurisdiction of United States courts to an enormous extent, as I will proceed to show.

Shortly before the passage of this act the Supreme Court decided that bonds payable to order were negotiable instruments. Therefore when this amendment was made all bonds falling due which had been transferred by indorsement could be sued upon in the United States courts, although the original parties to whom they had been issued could not have brought suit in that forum. It followed that parties who held bonds or promissory notes who were citizens of the same State as the payees of those instruments, and who held them by indorsement, if unable themselves to sue in a United States court passed them into the hands of other parties who could bring suit in those courts. The result has been to enlarge what was intended to be the legitimate jurisdiction of the circuit courts. I do not believe that it was ever the intention of Congress to so enlarge the jurisdiction as to permit anybody but the legitimate holder of the note by indorsement to bring suit in a United States court, yet the result has been that the holder of the note, if unable to sue in a United States court, has put it into the hands of somebody who could sue in that court, and the question of the right or title of the holder is not permitted to be inquired into.

Consequently, the creditor holding the note of a party living in the country, and who does not desire to put that note in suit where the debtor lives, which is an inconvenient locality, a different domicile from his own, transfers it to some non-resident party for suit in the Federal courts. For instance, a creditor residing in New Orleans, who holds the promissory note of a party residing in Shreveport, in the same State, places his note in the hands of a merchant or friend residing in New York, and the suit, instead of being instituted in the parish in which the city of Shreveport is located, (where the defendant should have a right to defend his case in his own domicile, before his own court, and before his own jury,) by this simulation will be brought in the circuit court in the city of New Orleans, three hundred miles distant from his home, and he will be required to defend it there, in a different jurisdiction, where a different system of practice prevails, before courts and juries which are not his own, and in a manner entirely different from that which was contemplated at the time the contract was made.

I know in my own practice, and I presume every Senator here knows, at least those who have practiced law in the South, that this proceeding is largely resorted to, and choses in action of this kind are put out of the hands of their holders and real owners in order that jurisdiction may be given to the United States court, it being a more convenient forum, at least for a creditor.

In addition to the inconvenience of locality, in addition to the fact that the debtor may be brought into a court for trial two, three, four, or five hundred miles from his domicile, the rules of practice, the rules governing execution, the modes of trial in the United States courts, may be entirely different from those prevailing in the State courts of the debtor's residence.

I do not know how it may be in other States, but in the courts of my own promissory notes are not tried by a jury unless the plea of non est factum is entered. That is the only question which can be inquired into by a jury in a suit upon a promissory note; but in the United States courts all cases must be tried by jury, unless the jury is expressly waived. In my State the right of appeal exists where the amount involved is over $1,000.

In a United States court the party cast cannot appeal under the present law unless the amount involved is over $5,000, and if we pass this bill unless the amount is over $10,000. Consequently either by the effect of this legislation, or by the frauds and simulations which may be perpetrated under it, debtors residing in the same State as their creditors may be deprived of the right to be sued before the courts of their domicile, may be deprived of the right to have their cases tried according to the laws of their State, and may be deprived of the right of appeal which is given to them by the laws of their State, all of which rights may have entered into their consideration at the time when they made the contract which forms the subject of litigation.

When you add to this the fact that bonds are now considered negotiable instruments, you find that every city, that every county, and every railroad company with overdue bonds are liable to the suit of their creditors who are citizens of the same State in the Federal courts. True, their contracts were made with bankers or others residing in the same State, and who could not sue upon them except in the courts of the State; but they have only to pass those bonds, as they do in almost every case, into the hands of bankers or brokers residing in New York or other money capitals of the country, and suits are invariably brought upon them in the United States courts, thus depriving debtors of the benefit of the local jurisdiction in which they made their contracts, thus depriving them of the right of appeal in many cases, and thus changing the whole intention of the contract at the time it was made and entered into, besides adding enormously to the volume of litigation in the circuit courts and necessarily in the Supreme Court of the United States by way of appeal.

I ask why should there be this distinction made between promissory notes and bills of exchange and other choses in action? Is there any reason why bills of exchange and promissory notes should be favored over other obligations? If I make a contract with a citizen of Louisiana, and I default in my contract, if the instrument is simply assignable, the assignee can only sue me in the courts of the State. If the contract is evidenced by a negotiable note, why should the holder have a greater right?

Why, let me ask, was this amendment introduced in the act of 1875, which opened the flood-gates of litigation in the courts of the United States to suits upon promissory notes, bonds, and bills of exchange? It certainly was and is not for the benefit of the debtor class, who constitute the largest portion of the people. There certainly exists no reason of public policy why the holders of promissory notes and bills of exchange, who hold a far higher order of security in case of litigation than a simple, especially a verbal contract, should be so favored, or why they should be permitted to bring their suits in the courts of the United States, while the holders of all other choses in action are left to pursue their remedy in the State courts.

It has fallen within my own experience since the passage of that act to see jurisdiction of the United States courts sought and obtained upon many occasions under the most flimsy pretenses. A man residing in New Orleans holds a promissory note made by a citizen of New Orleans. He is unwilling to go into the State courts. The amount involved may be under $5,000. He wants to avoid an appeal to the State supreme court. Therefore, and it has happened in innumerable cases, he transfers his domicile. Still residing in New Orleans, still carrying on his business, still occupying his home there, it still being his residence for all purposes, he goes to one of the watering-places across the lake in the State of Mississippi, spends two or three weeks there, buys himself a fishing cabin or locates at a boarding-house, and comes back and styles himself a citizen of Mississippi, and brings a suit upon the note in the Federal court. Such cases have happened repeatedly in my practice, and when a denial is made of his citizenship of course he swears it through, and upon the flimsiest pretenses jurisdiction is maintained by the court. I have never seen such a claim of citizenship set aside; it is in every case maintained.

I do not know how it is elsewhere, but the United States courts in my State never relax their grip upon jurisdiction when they once get hold of it, or when a suit has been once begun. Thus with this nominal citizenship he obtains a judgment for three or four thousand dollars in a court of the United States, which the defendant cannot appeal from; but if the suit had been brought in the courts of the State it could have been appealed to the supreme court of the State if the amount involved was over $1,000. This gross injustice is of constant occurrence, and is the fruit of the law which I desire to amend.

In respect to political corporations, especially the city of New Orleans, I wish to show the damage and great injustice that is effected by this enlargement of jurisdiction. The law of the State of Louisiana provides that no execution shall issue against the city of New Orleans. It has been the law for a long time. It antedates probably any of the obligations of the city of New Orleans, and was known to all parties who took those obligations or made contracts with her. Another plan of settlement is provided for by law. When judgments are obtained against the city of New Orleans they must be registered with the comptroller of the city and placed upon the budget of expenditures for the succeeding year, to be provided for by taxation. This rule is altogether disregarded in the circuit courts of the United States in New Orleans, although it is just as much the law as any portion of the Revised Statutes, and just as much the law of the United States courts as it is the law of the State courts, because section 916 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

> The party recovering a judgment in any common-law cause in any circuit or district court shall be entitled to similar remedies upon the same, by execution or otherwise to reach the property of the judgment debtor, as are now provided in like causes by the laws of the State in which such court is held, or by any such laws hereafter enacted which may be adopted by general rules of such circuit or district court; and such courts may, from time to time, by general rules, adopt such State laws as may hereafter be in force in such State in relation to remedies upon judgments, as aforesaid, by execution or otherwise.

This act, originally of June, 1872, was re-enacted in 1875. At the time it became the law of the United States it found the State law prevailing in Louisiana which exempted the city of New Orleans from execution, and yet the United States circuit courts treat this State law as a dead-letter, notwithstanding that it has been repeatedly brought to their attention and repeatedly plead in efforts to restrain executions against the city of New Orleans, from which unfortunately they have never been able to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is treated, I say, as a dead-letter.

Therefore, if a judgment is rendered against the city of New Orleans in the State courts it cannot be executed, but must be settled in the manner provided by law; but if a judgment is rendered in the United States circuit court on precisely a similar obligation against the city of New Orleans the court proceeds to execute it first by permitting an execution to issue which may be levied upon any property of the city of New Orleans when it can be found, and if none can be found by issuing a mandamus to compel the levy of a special tax for the purpose of paying the judgment. That is a matter of every-day process. Therefore, these judgments against the city of New Orleans are obtained on bonds by parties residing in the city of New Orleans. Parties really citizens of the city of New Orleans, parties who a few years ago when they took their obligations could not have sued the city of New Orleans except in the courts of the State of Louisiana, because there was no jurisdiction given on the bonds or promissory notes which they held, these parties by simply transferring their choses in action into the hands of other parties living in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, or Cincinnati, or by simply pretending to transfer their citizenship to some other State, even if but fifty or but seventy-five miles away, acquire the right to go into the United States courts, obtain judgments, and execute them against the city of New Orleans in the face of laws which exist on the statute-books of that State for the protection of that city from execution.

These are things I speak of from my own knowledge, because, having been attorney for the city of New Orleans for several years before I came to the Senate, I am familiar with all these proceedings, and have in vain endeavored to stop their consummation in courts of justice.

Again, by a provision of the charter of the city of New Orleans, which also antedates nearly every contract which she has in existence, or on which she has defaulted, the city is relieved from the obligation of giving security in any legal proceeding. She can appeal to the supreme court of the State without giving bond. Therefore, in all cases in which the city of New Orleans desires to go to the supreme court, she takes an appeal without giving bond, it operating as a supersedeas. If the city of New Orleans is sued by her own citizens in the courts of the State, she can carry the suit to the higher courts of the State without giving bond, but being sued in this manner, either by the transfer of these negotiable notes or bonds to parties living outside of the city, or by the simulated acts of her own citizens, when judgment is rendered against her in the circuit court, she is debarred from going to the Supreme Court, being unable, like most insolvent cities, to give that good and sufficient security which would be required to obtain a supersedeas on either an appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Therefore these acts of injustice result to the debtor class, whether individuals or corporations residing in my State, and I presume the same is the case in other States, from the passage of this little amendment, which opened the flood-gates of litigation, which overwhelmed the circuit courts with a new jurisdiction, and which in my opinion has been perverted far beyond the intent of the original legislation.

There is another and large number of cases which even under this legislation could not go to the courts of the United States. It was found necessary by litigants who held obligations that they wished to carry to that court to devise some other scheme or plan by which jurisdiction should be acquired and their causes transferred, and that was found in the act to amend an act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts," approved July 27, 1866, and the second section of the substitute which I have presented provides for its repeal. That act provides:

> That where a suit is now pending, or may hereafter be brought in any State court, in which there is controversy between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State, and the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of $500, exclusive of costs, such citizen of another State, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, if he will make and file in such State court an affidavit stating that he has reason to and does believe that, from prejudice or local influence, he will not be able to obtain justice in such State court, may, at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit, file a petition in such State court for the removal of the suit into the next circuit court of the United States to be held in the district where the suit is pending, and offer good and sufficient surety for his entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in said suit, and doing such other appropriate acts as, by the act to which this act is amendatory, are required to be done upon the removal of a suit into the United States court; and it shall be, thereupon, the duty of the State court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the suit; and the said copies being entered as aforesaid in such court of the United States, the suit shall there proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process; and all the provisions of the act to which this act is amendatory respecting any bail, attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, and respecting any bond of indemnity, or other obligation given upon the issuing or granting of any attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, shall apply with like force and effect in all respects to similar matters, process, or things in the suits for the removal of which this act provides.

This act passed in 1866 was doubtless in some sense a war measure or a reconstruction measure. A great many persons from the North were making their homes in the South, engaged in planting and in other occupations, and it perhaps was feared that there might be some prejudices growing out of the war which might result in a discrimination against these parties in matters pending in the courts of the State when under the control of the people of the State. It has no reference to proceedings under the civil-rights bill, because that was provided for in a subsequent statute, which still remains on the statute-book, and to which I do not propose to refer. But what has been the effect of this enactment? I have never known, at least in the State in which I reside, of a single case being removed from the State court to a Federal court under the provisions of this act because truthfully of local prejudices existing in a community within which the suit was brought against either party, plaintiff or defendant, but I have known repeated instances of transfers of suits under color of this law which were a complete fraud upon its intentions and a fraud upon the jurisdiction conferred by the statute. That is another reason why the dockets of the Supreme Court are so greatly overladen with business.

Before the passage of the act of 1875, which permitted the holders of negotiable paper to bring suit in a United States court, whether the original assignee or payee could have done so or not, it was found necessary for the holders of bonds and obligations falling due to institute suit, and in many cases which came under my supervision, these creditors being citizens probably of some State in the North, holding obligations which were payable to the order of a party residing in the same State as the payee, holding them in many instances by a simulated title, holding them merely for purposes of litigation and in order to bring suit in the United States court, their first process was to institute suit in the courts of the State, because, holding under assignment, the United States court had no jurisdiction. They would bring the suit in the court of the State, and before an answer was filed, before the defendant had entered any appearance, they would make an affidavit and file the bond required by this act and move the case to the courts of the United States on the ground that through local influence or prejudice they could not obtain justice in the courts of the State. This was done while the obligations upon which suit was brought were actually held by fellow-citizens of the payees, and the makers of the obligations.

This was done by parties bringing suit against whom no local prejudice could possibly exist, men who were wholly unknown in the community where suits were brought. It was done when the obligation on which they sued was not such as to create any prejudice, when there was no feeling against the enforcement of the obligation. It was done simply for the purpose of avoiding the statute and of getting a case into the United States courts, which had no original jurisdiction of the subject-matter. This was done upon promissory notes; it was done upon bonds; and a large number of the bond cases which came from the South, and which have been recently passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, came into the Federal courts and were originally tried under transfers effected through a perversion of the provisions of this act.

Why, Mr. President, it became customary for corporations residing in the city of New Orleans who desired to use the vehicle of the courts of the United States, in order to sue upon their choses in action, to have at hand some party or some stockholder who claimed to be a citizen of another State, and who could carry their suits into the courts of the United States by an averment that, through local influence and prejudice, he, as an individual or corporator or party holding stock in a corporation, could not get justice in the very community where his corporation was domiciled, and from whose people it derived its patronage and support; and in every case when the verity of these affidavits was tested, when the defendant who came to file his answer in the State court, and discovered for the first time that the cause had been removed by an affidavit setting forth that through local prejudice justice could not be obtained in that court, when the suit was upon a promissory note, or when the suit was upon a bond, and when his answer was a simple general denial or a plea of want of consideration, when he sought to have that case restored to the State court in which it was originally brought, and to controvert the statements in the affidavit, and to assert that there was no local prejudice to prevent the State court from rendering a just judgment, in every case, I say, which has come under my observation, the circuit courts of the United States have refused to enter into the question at all, and have considered the affidavit conclusive and sustained the jurisdiction of the Federal courts.

It has become, at least where I live, a common thing for parties who do a large business in bills of exchange, in bonds, in promissory notes, and negotiable instruments, either themselves to keep or to have some person or agent to whom these can be transferred, who, while living in our midst, while exercising all the privileges of citizenship, except perhaps that of the elective franchise—because the right to sue is considered by such individuals as a more valuable franchise than the right to vote—in every other respect being citizens of the community in which they have resided for years, they retain this false or foreign citizenship for the purpose of suing in the United States courts. The result is this immense flood of litigation, so that from this and the other cause to which I have alluded, from the city in which I reside, the number of cases that come to the Supreme Court of the United States are probably twenty times as many as they were before the passage of these acts, and the circuit court located in that State almost monopolizes its litigation. It is now a question how lawyers are to live who reside one hundred miles from the location of a United States court. Litigation tends so to the circuit court, the means are so many and are made such wide use of to enter the jurisdiction of that court, they are so used by the creditor class for the purpose of securing judgments upon their obligations, that, as I said before, lawyers residing one hundred miles from the city in which a Federal court is located find themselves starving for want of practice and the State courts are almost absolutely deserted.

There is a third cause for this immense increase of litigation, and I have included it in one of the amendments which I have offered, and that is the power to issue writs of mandamus by the circuit courts of the United States. One would be struck, if he examined the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States for the last twenty years, with the remarkable number of mandamus cases which have been heard by that court, with the immense proportion which they form of the whole number of cases decided every year in comparison with the very small and limited number which ever reached that court before the year 1860. The jurisdiction of the circuit court to issue writs of mandamus is found, if found at all, in section 716 of the Revised Statutes, being section 14 of the judiciary act of the 24th of September, 1789, which provides that—

> The Supreme Court and the circuit and district courts shall have power to issue writs of scire facias. They shall also have power to issue all writs not specifically provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the usages and principles of law.

Although I am concluded by the established jurisprudence of the Supreme Court, still I cannot help thinking it was never intended by this section to confer power to grant writs of mandamus on the circuit courts. I think so because the same judiciary act in express terms (re-enacted in section 638 of the Revised Statutes) granted to the Supreme Court the right to issue writs of mandamus in certain cases, because in section 3562 of the Revised Statutes a special jurisdiction is granted to the circuit courts to issue writs of mandamus in other cases, because I find by the act of February 27, 1875, the circuit courts are authorized to issue writs of mandamus to officers in other cases; and I find nowhere else, in a careful examination of the statutes of the United States—and I do not think it will be found anywhere else, except in this section 716—any power to the courts of the United States to issue writs of mandamus; and I think if it had been intended to confer that power by section 716 it would not have been specially conferred on the Supreme Court, (because this section applies to the Supreme Court as well as to circuit courts,) by another clause of the same act, and Congress would not have felt called upon at different times since to grant power to issue writs of mandamus in special cases.

I admit that the established jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of the United States has settled that they not only have the right, (if established jurisprudence gives the right,) but that they exercise it on all occasions, and that a large proportion of their opinions and decrees are rendered in the enforcement of applications for writs of mandamus to compel the payment of debts and obligations; but I find on examination that this power, if it exists, slumbered for some sixty years. The first case where the question arose of the right of the Supreme Court to issue the writ of mandamus, that I am able to discover, is reported in 7 Cranch, 504, the case of M'Intire vs. Wood. In that case an attempt was made to compel by mandamus a register of the land office in Ohio to issue a patent for lands, and the Supreme Court in a very brief decision decided:

> Independent of the particular objections which this case presents, from its involving a question of freehold, we are of opinion that the power of the circuit courts to issue the writ of mandamus is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. Had the eleventh section of the judiciary act covered the whole ground of the Constitution there would be much reason for exercising this power in many cases wherein some ministerial act is necessary to the completion of an individual right arising under laws of the United States, and the fourteenth section of the same act would sanction the issuing of the writ for such a purpose. But although the judicial power of the United States extends to cases arising under the laws of the United States, the Legislature have not thought proper to delegate the exercise of that power to its circuit courts, except in certain specified cases. When questions arise under those laws in the State courts, and the party who claims a right or privilege under them is unsuccessful, an appeal is given to the Supreme Court, and this provision the Legislature has thought sufficient at present for all the political purposes intended to be answered by the clause of the Constitution which relates to this subject.

Thus denying a mandamus even to compel a ministerial officer to comply with the law. This opinion, which was subsequently modified, would show that the Supreme Court shortly after the adoption of the judiciary act almost doubted their power to grant the writ of mandamus at all, and certainly only for the purpose of carrying out and enforcing their jurisdiction.

I find that in 1825, twelve years after, in the case of Wayman vs. Southard, 6 Peters' Cond., 4, the Supreme Court were called upon to decide whether under a judgment rendered by the circuit court of the United States and affirmed by the Supreme Court execution could issue. Thirty-five years after the passage of the "judiciary act" it was questioned in the courts of the United States and questioned for the first time and decided for the first time in the Supreme Court, that the courts of the United States had power to issue writs of execution upon the judgments which had been rendered by them. It was contended that with rendition of the judgment the power of the courts ceased and they could go no further, and that the party who had received the benefit of the judgment must resort to other process in order to collect his money.

It was not until the case of the Board of Commissioners of Knox County vs. Aspinwall et al., reported in 24 Howard, page 376, and decided in 1860, that the Supreme Court for the first time decided that the circuit courts of the United States had the right to issue writs of mandamus in aid of the execution of their judgments, and the case was so new and so original that, although the arguments of the counsel on both sides are given in full, they could refer to no precedent, they could refer to no decision. It was a virgin pasture of litigation untouched. They could only refer to and comment upon the case decided thirty-five years before, in which the power of the courts of the United States to issue writs of execution had been called in question. And yet the organ of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Grier, seems to treat it as a matter of no doubt, and the Supreme Court granted the writ of mandamus to compel the board of commissioners of the county to levy a tax for the purpose of paying a judgment which had been rendered in the circuit court for the State of Indiana. The court ask—

> Why should not the circuit court of the United States be competent to give to suitors this only adequate remedy?
> By the common law, the writ of mandamus is granted by the King's Bench, in virtue of its prerogative and supervisory power over inferior courts. The courts of the United States cannot issue this writ by virtue of any supervisory power at common law over inferior State tribunals. They can derive it only from the Constitution and laws of the United States.
> The jurisdiction of these courts is, by the Constitution, extended to "controversies between citizens of different States." Congress has authority to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying this jurisdiction into effect. The jurisdiction of the court to give the judgment in this case is not disputed; nor can it be denied that by the Constitution Congress has the power to make laws necessary for carrying into execution all its judgments. (See Wayman vs. Southard, 10 Wheaton, 22.) Has it done so?
> By the fourteenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 it is enacted "that courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the principles of the common law." Now, the "jurisdiction" is not disputed, and it is "necessary" to an efficient exercise of this jurisdiction that the court have authority to compel the exercise of a ministerial duty by the corporation, which by law they are bound to perform, and by the performance of which alone the plaintiff's remedy can be effected. The fund to pay this judgment, by the face of the contract, is a special tax laid and to be collected by defendants. They refuse to perform a plain duty. There is no other writ which can afford the party a remedy, which the court is bound to afford, if within its constitutional powers, except that afforded by this writ of mandamus.
> It is "agreeable to the principles of the common law," and consequently within the category as defined by the statute. (The Board of Commissioners of Knox County vs. Aspinwall et al., 24 Howard, pages 384, 385.)

I say, Mr. President, that this was the first case in which the Supreme Court had ever asserted this power in the courts of the United States, and this was in 1860, nearly seventy years after the passage of the judiciary act. After a long and varied litigation, for the first time in 1860, the Supreme Court decided that the courts of the United States had the power to issue writs of mandamus in furtherance of the execution of their judgments.

I say, notwithstanding the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court since affirming this case of Knox County vs. Aspinwall, we can well doubt whether this latent power would have been allowed to slumber for seventy years if it had been generally believed to exist. With all the great lawyers who assisted in the formation of the Constitution and in the passage of the judiciary act, who practiced in the early days of the Supreme Court, and who were engaged in the great litigations of those times, if they had deemed that any such power existed in the courts of the United States, would they not have so declared? But it has been affirmed over and over again, it has been affirmed ten, twenty, perhaps fifty times, in nearly every volume of the reports which have been published since it has become the ordinary process of the Federal courts, and that is the reason why holders of negotiable notes and holders of bonds resort to the United States courts for the purpose of having their obligations placed in judgment.

Utterly unbridled is the jurisdiction we have given to the United States courts, and through a perversion of that jurisdiction nearly every holder of an obligation of this kind against a county, against a city, against a political corporation or a municipal corporation, against a private corporation that has issued obligations or bonds, on their falling due contrives by hook or crook to get them into the United States courts to obtain judgment, and to follow that judgment by an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the levy of a tax for the purpose of paying the judgment, and the writ of mandamus comes to the Supreme Court whenever the debtor is able to give bond, and the power is exercised remorselessly and ruthlessly by the lower court when he is not able to give bond for an appeal, and even if he was permitted by the laws of his State to take an appeal without giving bond.

Thus the city of New Orleans, with a large bonded debt, if pursued by the original holders of its bonds, whose contract was that they should sue in the State courts on default, and if they should be left to their remedies as they existed, and perhaps morally and legally exist now, they would be compelled to resort to the State courts for judgment, and if judgment should obtain the city of New Orleans, if she thought proper, could appeal to the supreme court of the State without giving bond, but if the judgment was affirmed by the supreme court of the State no execution could issue, but the judgment was to be settled according to the provisions of the charter and the laws made in pursuance thereof. On the other hand, jurisdiction being transferred to the United States courts, either honestly or by simulation, judgments are obtained to a large amount which she cannot meet, and, being insolvent, she cannot give bond to appeal. Therefore execution issues, and the execution being returned "no property found," a mandamus issues to compel the city of New Orleans to levy a tax for the purpose of meeting the judgment, and all the laws of the State of Louisiana and all the enactments passed by the State of Louisiana for the protection of that municipal corporation, and which existed, most of them, before these bonds were issued or put upon the market, are disregarded by the courts of the United States, and a different justice is meted out to those who are fortunate enough to bring their suit within the purview of the courts of the United States as against those who bring their suits in the courts of the State.

But if the courts of the United States have this jurisdiction, as the Supreme Court has decided that they have, if this jurisdiction which slept for seventy years and then woke up to be so enormous and so overwhelming, still exists, there is all the more reason why we should withdraw it, and leave the courts of the United States only that jurisdiction in writs of mandamus which would allow them to issue such writs to ministerial officers to compel them to perform duties imposed on them by law, and to leave the execution of their judgments as the execution of judgments in other courts are left, to the sheriff or the marshal.

If this system is to prevail any longer every county and every city in the country will be put up at auction. The communities of the West and South are all in debt, and their obligations are falling due, and those obligations, in every instance when suit is necessary, find their way into the hands of foreign creditors, and under the purview of these laws are put in the United States courts, and they are dragged through those courts to Washington, a mandamus to levy a tax to pay the judgment is issued, and they are deprived of the benefit of a local jurisprudence, are deprived of the benefit of their local courts, are deprived of the benefit of their local juries. The jury in United States courts in my State—we have two districts now—hitherto has been selected entirely from citizens of New Orleans, and people were brought there from three hundred miles distance to try their causes before a jury none of whom were of the vicinage. I say if this thing is to continue the whole country will suffer, and I do not know where it is to end. Railroad corporations, towns, cities, counties, are all liable to be brought into the United States courts and subject to be mandamused, and I do not know how long it will be before States are put under the same process, for an attempt is being made now against the State which I represent in the Supreme Court of the United States to claim original jurisdiction for the benefit of citizens of the State of New Hampshire and the State of New York, who have transferred their obligations to the States in which they reside, and those States claim the right to bring suit for the benefit of their citizens and to enforce a jurisdiction, which will drag the State of Louisiana before the forum of the Supreme Court in spite of the provisions of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. President, I think these things are worthy of consideration. I do not think it is in the interest of the people of this country so much that the labors of the Supreme Court shall be reduced as that the jurisdiction of the United States courts shall be reduced, that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall be reduced, and citizens of the same State shall be permitted to sue each other in the courts of their own States, and that these laws, allowing transfers, allowing choses in action to be passed from hand to hand, by which the judiciary act and its real intent and meaning are defeated, should be repealed. That is the best way to relieve the Supreme Court and to relieve the circuit courts of this enormous jurisdiction and the enormous number of cases now pressing upon them.

It is proposed to relieve the Supreme Court in this bill by increasing the appealable interest, by providing that no one shall carry a case to the Supreme Court of the United States unless the amount involved is $10,000. A similar effort was made a few years ago, when the appealable amount was changed from $2,000 to $5,000. That caused a great deal of complaint. The people have important causes, men with small fortunes have interests that are as much entitled to consideration as the interests of men with large fortunes. In the country in which I live there are few men who have cases involving $10,000, and yet the principles involved are frequently of vast consequence and entitled to be heard by the first court of the nation.

I ask whether it is in the interest of the people of this country that the Supreme Court should be converted into a tribunal only to hear the causes of those whose interests are large, and not to hear the causes of those whose interests are small, although the principle involved may be just as important in the one case as the other? If we go on with this system we may increase from year to year, it may be necessary to make the limit $20,000 or $25,000 or $50,000, and as the tendency in this country unfortunately is for a few large fortunes to accumulate vastly, and for other fortunes to be reduced, as every day there is a class of rich men in this country growing richer and richer, and the majority of the people growing poorer and poorer, the supreme tribunal may one of these days be left to try the case of Jay Gould vs. Vanderbilt, or of some great railroad corporation against another, while the interests of the citizens of this country, scattered throughout all the States of the Union, will be too small for their consideration, because the amount involved does not reach the appealable limit.

I say, Mr. President, we had better reduce their jurisdiction rather than increase the appealable interest. Preserve the right of the humblest citizen to go before that court. I do not wish to attack any judge or any court. I wish to express no opinion about the courts in my own section. I have my opinion. I agree in much that has been said by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Florida. There are incompetent judges on the bench in that section of the country, and who will remain on the bench if this bill passes, and who will form a part of this court of appeals. Is it to be said that because the amount of interest involved in a case is not $10,000 the people of this country who have vast and important interests, who have interests at least vast and important to them, which involve their homes, which involve all they have, which involve all their rights—that they shall not be heard before the Supreme Court?

These courts of appeal will be necessarily inferior courts, and in the opinion of many of the people incompetent courts; and shall they not be permitted to carry their causes beyond the courts of appeal and to the Supreme Court of the United States, because the amount involved, although it is their all, is not $10,000?

I do not think such legislation will be popular with the people of this country. I do not think we can afford to legislate always for the benefit of the creditor class and against the debtor. I think the courts of the country should be open to all. I think the present amount fixed as a limit for appeals is high enough. I think the important interests which are involved among our poorer citizens should have a hearing in that august tribunal as well as the contests between millionaires and capitalists and great corporations. I think that in order to lighten the labors of that court, which I admit are excessive, we should take off some of this jurisdiction which is improperly conferred upon it, which is for the benefit of the creditor class, and for the extension of and preference given to which I can see no good and sufficient reason.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection to that motion, but I wish to take the floor on the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Arkansas as entitled to the floor when the consideration of this bill is resumed to-morrow. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow us to call up a bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. There are some nominations that ought to be acted on to-day.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It will not take five minutes to dispose of the bill I wish to have considered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Senator can get up his bill to-morrow.

Mr. VAN WYCK. With the understanding that it shall be done to-morrow, I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seventeen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 4, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DUNNELL. Before the regular order is proceeded with, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] whether some time may not be fixed when amendments to the tariff-commission bill may be presented and printed? I have been asked frequently when amendments might be presented, so that they could be read by members before Saturday, when I understand it is expected the vote will be taken.

Mr. KASSON. They can be presented at any time, I suppose, in connection with the statements of gentlemen, and printed in the RECORD, if they desire. The usual time for considering amendments is of course immediately after the close of the general debate. In this connection, I wish to say that from present information it is believed that general debate on the part of members who have not yet spoken, other than members of the Committee on Ways and Means, may be terminated to-day, even early to-day, so that gentlemen of that committee who have not yet spoken may even to-day begin their remarks in conclusion of the debate. I move, therefore, to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. KASSON. I beg further to say that I hope for a vote on Saturday in the House upon the report of the Committee of the Whole.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) granting condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the tariff-commission bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2315) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, for many years I have advocated as a private citizen the principle and the policy involved in the bill which is now directly before us for the "appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff." As an officer in commercial associations I have urged the measure, and repeatedly presented resolutions for the appointment of such a commission to inaugurate its revision. I appreciate that this House is wearied by the extended discussion we have had, and feel somewhat oppressed that I am obliged to consume any more of its valuable time, yet I am so earnestly in favor of the bill that I desire not only to record my vote but ask your indulgence while I very briefly give some of the reasons for my conclusions—some of the arguments that influence me to advocate its passage.

We all, Mr. Chairman, bring into this Hall the convictions which we have acquired in the varied walks of life that we have followed. Possibly no class of men are impressed more or taught more by experience and observation than those who represent the business and commercial interests of the country. We cannot plan a venture by land or sea without scanning with great care all the circumstances of the past and the present, and anticipating even the future if we would insure safety and success. It seems to me that a measure so important and complicated as the revision of the tariff should be considered in the same spirit, and that in solving the difficult problem every reasonable opportunity for detailed as well as general information should be availed of.

Before I entered this Hall as a member of Congress I was satisfied from my experience that the wise and judicious method of revising the tariff was first through the work of a commission. And, sir, this plan has not been advocated by a few individuals scattered here and there. It has been indorsed by boards of trade and the commercial associations of the country. The most influential classes interested in the question have constantly made appeals to the Congress of the United States that in changing or revising the tariff they should do it with care, with precision, with wisdom, through the efforts of a commission appointed from civil life by the Government.

Mr. Chairman, as we have listened to a single manufacturer on this floor [Mr. HEWITT, of New York] who has asked for summary legislation and opposed this bill, I desire to call attention to a petition which I hold in my hand in favor of the measure before us:

FEBRUARY 15, 1882.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned respectfully represent that in April, 1880, they sent to your honorable bodies a communication as follows:

"The undersigned, persons engaged in the manufacture of cotton yarns and fabrics and the dyeing, coloring, bleaching, and printing of the same, and holding various opinions upon the tariff question, respectfully represent that they have observed with great interest the bringing in of a bill to the Senate of the United States by Mr. Eaton, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Finance, and reported by Mr. BAYARD, with amendments, April 13, 1880, entitled 'A bill for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of a tariff;' that they have carefully considered the provisions of said bill, and are earnestly in favor of the passage of the same and the appointment of a civil commission as contemplated therein, believing that in no other way can the requisite information be secured for the use of Congress when considering a revision of the tariff.

"The industries above mentioned consume approximately 1,500,000 bales of cotton annually, operate 10,000,000 spindles, and employ over $200,000,000 of capital."

And the undersigned beg again to express their confidence in said bill and in the bill now before the Senate (S. No. 22) reported by Mr. BAYARD January 10, 1882, and to say that they do not advocate the appointment of a commission to investigate the tariff for the purpose of delaying action, as has been alleged, but on the contrary with the desire of furthering the revision of the tariff at the earliest possible date.

They ask for the appointment of a commission from civil life. The signers of this petition state that they represent industries employing $200,000,000 of capital; that they consume annually 1,500,000 bales of cotton and operate more than 10,000,000 spindles in the industries of the United States. I wish to impress upon this House the strength and importance of this petition, representing nearly fifty manufacturers, every one of them the peer in experience and intelligence of the gentleman who, as a manufacturer, has opposed this bill. I shall print with my remarks this petition, that the members of the House may be impressed from its consideration that it is true that there is a sincere, earnest, and intelligent call for the passage of this bill from the manufacturers of New England; that they do not urge the passage of this measure for the purpose of delaying action upon the revision of the tariff, as charged by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Chairman, not only in the experience of private and business life, and outside the walls of Congress as a citizen, have I been impressed with the importance of the appointment of this commission, but as a civilian coming before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives on repeated occasions in the discussions of questions concerning the tariff I have been impressed with the fact that the committee is not adequate to the task which this House and the country in the past have expected it to perform. I have been impressed with the fact that notwithstanding all their intelligence and ability members of that committee have neither the time nor the experience to treat a question like this in the detailed manner that is required. More than that, without reflecting upon the honesty of purpose or their motives, I have found that the prejudices of parties, the influence of sections were not without their effect upon their opinions. They naturally adhere to the theories which for years they have fostered and encouraged; they cannot break away from the influence and the convictions which have surrounded them in their own sections of the country.

Again, sir, the class of men who appear before them are not such as would supplement by facts and figures in detail from the people the general information required for an intelligent and careful revision of so important and elaborate a measure as the tariff. They reach the same men who are quoted here in the general discussion on the tariff, the statisticians, the compilers of statistics, the representatives of boards of trade, the men who represent the great monopolies, or who represent corporations with large interests. They should reach, beside, the people—those who have studied not only the statistics of the decades, but are practically familiar with the present facts from all classes, that are required properly to adjust and formulate a wise and discriminating tariff. They do not secure a general representation of enterprise and labor.

The convictions and the impressions which I acquired in private life and from observations as a civilian before this committee have been confirmed since I have been honored as a member of Congress and had some experience in these Halls. I do not think that the Committee on Ways and Means at this session of Congress, whatever their ability, have more time than is required to adjust the duties on a very few articles. I believe it to be absolutely impossible to revise our tariff, which comprises thousands of articles and involves the interests of a great nation with fifty millions of people.

In the construction and formation of the important committees of this House we find that many are selected from the leaders of their parties, and members of this Committee on Ways and Means have not only to revise the tariff but to consider and report upon a large number of important matters for legislation of equal consequence to those particularly interested in them. They are expected to be present here also, to deliberate with us, and take part in the discussions. There is in addition detailed work which comes to each member of Congress. It is not possible, physically or mentally, in my judgment, for the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives properly to revise the tariff of the United States and to give us such a tariff as the country demands and requires at the present time. I do not wish to have it understood, Mr. Chairman, that I underrate the ability of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have the highest respect for the individual members of that committee, not only for those who agree with me on the political questions of the day, but for the opponents of the Republican party on the other side of the House. I have not only enjoyed their acquaintance but the friendship of some of them for many years.

I do not underrate the House of Representatives, for no man can come here and remain a year and depart hence without a higher respect for the ability, the honesty, and the industry of the representatives of the people who assemble upon this floor.

But the fact is, Mr. Chairman, we are not called on to revise a tariff that can be arranged in a simple manner upon general principles alone. We are not called upon to pass a free-trade tariff, or a tariff for revenue, or a tariff that is to levy its duties by a certain percentage of 10, 20, 30, 40 or 50 per cent. or easily arranged specific duties. That is not the kind of tariff the American people demand to-day, that the interests of the country call for to-day, or that the majority of this House is in favor of.

If that were the case, some simple proposition upon general principles that could be drawn from the general information we have had laid before us in our voluminous debates, or we could get from almanacs and statistical reports, might easily be perfected. If that were the kind of tariff we needed, I then might concede that the Committee on Ways and Means could deal with it effectually. But, sir, let us for a moment, while we speak of the revision of the tariff, ask ourselves what is the work before us? Let the members of the House of Representatives, as the business men of the country do, consider the duty they have to perform and wisely and deliberately determine how they can discharge the trust most satisfactorily to themselves and to the people they represent.

I will not enter into an extended argument to prove to you the complications of the present tariff. The country, after careful discussion throughout the last political campaign, have voted for a tariff "that discriminates in favor of American labor." I think the people have decided that the wisest course is not to change the policy of the Government hastily. They will not disregard the vested rights and industries that have been developed and fostered under our present policy. I believe the majority of the country at the same time are determined to have a tariff which shall be simple and uniform, under which can be collected the largest amount of revenue with the least burden to the people. And such a tariff cannot be arranged except by the careful consideration and investigation of all the present circumstances connected with it.

Mr. Chairman, the necessity of revision has been conceded everywhere. I could take the speeches on this side of the House or as well on the other side of the House and demonstrate it. I simply refer, therefore, to some of the complications connected with the tariff to illustrate, to enforce the assertions which I have made in regard to the proper action for its revision.

We have a tariff that embraces two thousand five hundred different articles, and I quote from the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] who opposes the commission, the statement that the percentage of duties levied ranges on different articles from 10 to 780 per cent.

We have a tariff that levies a duty upon foreign manufactured goods to obtain a revenue and protect our own industries, and we levy a duty for the same purpose on the raw material. It is complicated, and it is necessary we should adjust the scale with careful discrimination so that the changes shall apply with uniformity and do justice to manufacturers and producers, and to the great mass of the people who are overtaxed upon the prime necessities of life.

To illustrate the complications connected with one single branch of manufacturing, I will refer again to the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] which I hold in my hand:

Let us begin with woolen goods; and for the sake of brevity I will omit the specific rate and give the equivalent ad valorem rate as it is officially reported to us from the Bureau of Statistics for the last fiscal year.

On dress goods, women's and children's wear, worth at the place of production 17.3 cents per square yard, the duty is only a fraction less than 70 per cent., while on the same kind of goods, but of finer quality, and worth $1.75 per pound, the duty is less than 63½ per cent. On the coarse woolen blankets, such as the people of small means are compelled to use, worth 54 cents per pound, the duty is 90½ per cent., but on the fine blankets, worth $1.37 per pound, the duty is 71½ per cent. On flannels worth 44½ cents per pound, the duty is only a fraction less than 103 per cent., while on the finer flannels, worth $1.64 per pound, the tax is 65½ per cent. On woolen hosiery worth 55 cents per pound, the law imposes a duty equivalent to 89½ per cent. ad valorem, but if the article is worth $2.41 per pound the duty is less than 56 per cent.

On all woolen goods not otherwise provided for in the law costing at the place of production less than 40 cents per pound the duty is 84½ per cent., but if they cost $1.47 per pound the duty is 69 per cent. On coarse hats of wool worth only 65½ cents per pound the specific duty imposed is equivalent to 96 per cent. ad valorem, but on the finer qualities, costing $2.15 per pound, the duty is only a little more than 58 per cent.

The finest and most expensive carpets imported into this country, worth $2.24 per square yard, are subject to a duty of 50 per cent., while druggets, bockings, &c., worth 40 cents per square yard, are subject to a duty of nearly 96½ per cent., and carpets worth 68 cents per square yard pay a fraction less than 76 per cent.

I am aware that the gentleman referred to these articles with a different purpose from that which leads me to call attention to them at this time. I am arguing in favor of the commission and endeavoring to impress upon the House the complications of the tariff, and to prove that by no other method can we so intelligently deal with its revision. With this thought in my mind, and that I might call attention at the time to this fact and to the excessive duty manufacturers paid upon wool, I asked the gentleman when he was addressing the House the question, "What is the duty on wool, on the raw material that enters into the manufacture?" The gentleman thought I "misunderstood the purpose of that part of his argument." I did not wish to interrupt him by enlarging upon it at that time, but to complete the comparison I now present to you the wide range of heavy duties levied on the wool, on the raw material imported into this country. It seems to me that no exact comparison of duties on manufactured articles is complete without careful scrutiny of the tariff on the raw material:

With this comparison, I urge the necessity of detailing information. I ask the members of this House if they believe there is a man on the floor they think qualified to take up that single article of trade alone and do justice to all the interests involved in its production and manufacture, without giving weeks to its investigation, and obtaining additional and different information from that which has been given to us in the protracted debate we have listened to upon the subject.

I will refer to another article, which is one of the most important on the list. If the Committee on Ways and Means should undertake to revise the tariff on sugar I do not believe they can have a satisfactory investigation and hearing upon that single article and have it legislated upon after giving their information to the House in a month's time. The country demands that duties on this article shall be revised and reduced. On account of the complications connected with the duties and Treasury regulations in regard to it, the merchants and refiners have been oppressed by lawsuits and exactions, and under a recent decision of the Supreme Court about $2,000,000 has to be refunded from the Treasury to the men from whom it has been illegally exacted. Forty-five millions of dollars a year is wrung from the people as a tax upon this article of prime necessity to every class. If the people understood and comprehended how unjust and excessive it is, the mechanics and laboring-men would be relieved from this burden.

The process of refining sugar has constantly improved, and the article can now be refined in the United States at as low a cost as in any part of the world. Some, interested in this department of our industries, claim that it can be more cheaply done in this country, on account of the skill and perfection of the processes and machinery applied and used by them.

There have been twelve different rates of duty levied since 1789, embracing both the specific and ad valorem principle.

From 1846 to 1857 we had an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent.; from 1857 to 1861 an ad valorem duty of 24 per cent.; from that time we increased the duty from three-quarters of a cent per pound to three, three and a half, and four cents per pound in 1864, and these rates were in force until 1870, when we adopted the present rates, to which we have added since 25 per cent. The great increase of duties was made as a war measure at first, and only justified in 1870 by the necessities of taxing the people very heavily to meet the interest and reduce the principal on the immense debt that burdens the country.

The duties on sugar at the present time are as follows, grading them by the Dutch standard of color on the grades of raw sugar principally used by the refiners in producing the qualities of sugar used for consumption:

Melado tank bottoms, &c., 1½ cents per pound, plus 25 per cent.
Not above No. 7, D. S. in color, 1¾ cents per pound, plus 25 per cent.
Not above No. 10, D. S. in color, 2 cents per pound, plus 25 per cent.
Not above No. 13, D. S. in color, 2¼ cents per pound, plus 25 per cent.

Or to calculate it exactly, giving the trade designation or places where produced, the rates are as follows:

Country and grade.	Test by polarization, giving the degrees of saccharine strength per pound, taking pure crystals as the basis at 100°.	Cost of sugar free on board ship at the shipping port without freight or charges, per pound.	Present duty per pound.	Percentage of duty calculated upon a basis of 7/8 cents per pound for good refining West India muscovado sugar, duty paid here.
China	76.78	$2 65	$2 20	83
Manila, superfine	78.81	2 88	2 20	76
Iloilo	82.84	3 38	2 40	71
Manila, extra superfine	86.87	3 87	2 45	63
Pernambuco	88.90	3 88	2 50	64
Bahia	83.85	3 50	2 25	64
Muscovado, fair refining, W. I	87.89	4 23	2 50	59
Java	93.95	5 06	2 60	51
Centrifugals	93.94	5 30	2 60	49
Centrifugals, W. I	95.97	5 68	2 81	49

The practical working of the tariff, however, at the present time is not according to the intention of the law upon the centrifugal sugars of high test from the West Indies, as the producers in making their sugar allow the surface of the crystal to be burned to a dark color below No. 10 Dutch standard, or even below No. 7, so that these sugars actually pay only the same duty as low-grade sugars of 76° to 82° strength. They are in reality partially refined in Cuba at a much higher cost, which we pay for, as we can do the same work at a less cost here and find more employment for our own workmen.

The late Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. John Sherman, tried to collect the duty by a polariscope test, claiming that the colorization was fraudulent, but the Supreme Court has decided that the regulation and the collection of duties under it were illegal. The scale of duties on the lighter-colored sugars graded according to the Dutch standard of color above No. 13, is as follows:

No. 13 to 16, (low grade,) common brown sugar, 2¼ cents and 25 per cent., 3.43 cents per pound.
No. 16 to 20, common brown sugar, 3¼ and 25 per cent., 4.06 cents per pound.
Above No. 20, refined, white and crystals, 4 cents and 25 per cent., 5 cents per pound.

The present tariff levies duties on sugar in favor of the rich and against the poor. It discriminates against the raw sugars that when refined give to the poor man the largest percentage of saccharine or sweetening strength for the lowest price, as the refiner can buy the lower grades of raw sugar and refine them up to the grade called Scotch or brown sugars at a less proportional cost to the consumer than by extending his process and extracting the sirup or molasses retained in that grade, which must be taken out to produce a white crystallized article; and if the duties upon the lower grades of sugar were proportionally at the same rate with that on the higher grades or stronger sugars, such as the Java and centrifugal, the poor man's sugar would be produced at a proportionally less cost, and they who preferred the white crystals would pay as they should for the luxury. It is not necessary to make comparisons on sugars as to their cost between the present time and previous years; the production of sugars, the processes of refining them, and the kinds of sugar that enter into consumption have so changed the conditions.

The facts we would study and examine are those that exist to-day. Do the people of this country understand all the duties that are exacted upon this article from the rate on the lowest grade of the raw product of $2\frac{28}{100}$ cents per pound to the highest, a duty of five cents upon every pound of the white crystallized, granulated, or powdered sugar, such as is used in daily consumption?

With this detail, with the facts before us in regard to single articles, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in a summary way proposes to recommit the "bill creating a tariff commission to the Committee on Ways and Means, with positive instructions to report a bill covering the whole tariff within thirty days."

In my judgment the proper course to pursue is for this House to pass this bill for the appointment of a tariff commission, and then, without further delay, for the Committee on Ways and Means to report a tariff bill, to be passed at this session, reducing the duties on some raw materials, in justice to the people, and increase the free list where it can be done without injustice to any. I believe the majority of this House will indorse the proposition and that the country demands it. If the Democratic party oppose, let us have them placed upon the record, that the people may know who favored and who obstructed and defeated these measures.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not alone the revision of the tariff so far as the figures are concerned, or so far as the discriminating purposes of the tariff are concerned; it is not alone on account of the work required in the revision of the tariff that I advocate and favor a commission. I have heard so many misrepresentations and exaggerations in regard to my section of the country, I have heard so many false assumptions applied to the manufacturing interests of this country that I desire the people of the country, men of the West and of the South, shall know what the purposes and the wishes of the manufacturing interests of New England are.

The speeches that I have listened to on this floor convince me that there are men who represent constituencies here who require new light in regard to the wishes and the demands and the necessities of the people of other sections. I have heard the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. TURNER,] that came down to us from preceding generations, and that of his colleague, [Mr. MCKENZIE,] with all its exaggerations and misstatements, and I desire the people of Kentucky to know, from the information we will give them through this commission, that their leaders are not properly qualified to lead them as prophets in their own country, with their present information, to wise and just national legislation on the tariff. I believe, sir, that nothing can be of more service to this country than the expression of the opinions of the labor and enterprise of the country as it will be given through a commission. I desire not only that the manufacturers shall be heard, but I desire that the producers and the agriculturalists shall be heard upon this question. In no way can it be done excepting through a commission. I desire, too, that the laboring-men, the men who toil from the rising to the setting sun, so worthy of their hire, shall be heard before this commission upon this question in regard to their wages, their cost of living, all the advantages they enjoy in this country compared with others, as well as to the burdens that taxation places upon them. I would seek through this commission to get at the facts and the truth.

Sir, there is another argument still in favor of this commission. It will create a public opinion in the United States. The question of the tariff has been dragged down into partisan politics. Now, let us have the information from the people and see if we cannot lift it up as a question of political economy to be discussed by the Congress of the United States with the evidence before them.

Mr. Chairman, as I stated at the commencement of my speech here to-day, I shall be as brief as it is possible for me to be and at the same time to express my strong and earnest and decided conviction in favor of this commission. We have had a great many speeches upon the subject. I cannot understand how any man can feel satisfied that he is prepared to act with the information before him. But of all the speeches that have been delivered to this House I agree with the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] that the most unsound proposition and to me the most unsatisfactory reasoning was found in the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] All the arguments, all the suggestions, all the comparisons I have offered apply more strongly against the proposition which he presented to the House than to the general propositions which have been made by some others who have addressed the committee. He has a summary way of dealing with the question. He disregards all the expressed opinions that have come from, I say, the most intelligent associations of the country, and he proposes summarily to recommit the bill with a substitute back to the committee with instructions to report that substitute, or substantially that, in thirty days. He proposes in thirty days to settle, so far as some of the great vested interests are concerned, this whole question. Let us read his resolutions:

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, said:
Mr. CHAIRMAN: I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a resolution which, at the proper time after the discussion is closed, I propose to offer.
The Clerk read as follows:
Resolved, That the bill creating a tariff commission be recommitted with instructions to the Committee on Ways and Means to report within thirty days, or an earlier date if it be practicable, a bill based upon the following instructions:
First. That all raw materials, meaning thereby all materials which have not been subjected to any process of manufacture, and all waste products, meaning thereby all waste materials which are fit only to be manufactured, and all chemicals which are not produced in this country, and alcohol for use in manufactures, shall be placed upon the free list.
Second. That so far as possible specific duties shall be substituted for ad valorem duties, and that in determining such specific duties the average dutiable value of imports during the last three years shall be taken as the standard of value, upon which no higher rate of duty shall be imposed than shall be necessary to compensate for the difference in the cost of the labor at home and abroad expended in the production of such products, after making due allowance for the expenses of transportation, and that the rate of duty shall not in any case, except on luxuries, exceed 50 per cent. of such average dutiable value.

I predict, sir, that if the proposition submitted by the gentleman from New York was adopted, if we had any change of tariff at all, we should launch upon the country a crude unsatisfactory measure, and that the Congress of the United States would be called upon to tinker and change it at every session for a series of years, until they were forced to finally adopt the plan of a commission. I do not believe it is possible to have it adopted. It is a proposition for delay. I wish to call attention to its unsoundness. As I read his speech it seemed to me that the proposition and his argument were not in accord; while he proposed this summary operation of disposing of the tariff in thirty days, when you cannot discuss any three articles of it in half that time, he incorporates in his speech a statement asking you to do something else. His argument is really against his resolutions. He tells us in his speech that we must proceed slowly, that we must take up this matter with deliberation. He says:

We must therefore proceed slowly so as not to interfere with the occupations of people, and not to dislocate industry to such an extent that men are compelled to seek new occupations by a sudden stoppage of those in which they are engaged. This has happened in Germany, where the new revenue system of a highly protective nature has positively destroyed many branches of business and reduced whole towns to a condition of destitution. In lowering the duties I would be careful to avoid these calamitous consequences, for, as I have said, there is no evil in a community equal to the lack of employment for those who desire work. Persons out of work not only become demoralized, but they compete with others who are employed, reducing the standard of comfort and lowering the moral status of the entire community. They are not only paupers themselves, but they breed pauperism—a social disease so persistent when once permitted to get a foothold that no amount of moral quarantine is ever adequate to remove it.

Shall we accept his proposition, or shall we stand upon his argument? If you follow his speech through, what do you find? That he closes it with one of the most exaggerated statements that I have listened to for a great while. I will read to you a few words from that portion of his speech to which I refer:

With a failure, however, to comprehend the situation it will come through convulsions and revolutions, from the suffering and horrors of which I prefer to turn away in silence.
But there is one aspect of the case to which I cannot shut my eyes. The whole structure and genius of our Government must be changed in order to meet the primary necessity which will thus arise for preserving social order. With the general occurrence of strikes and lockouts will come, as in the case of the railroad riots in 1877, the demand upon the Federal Government for the presence of its troops to maintain order and put down violence and mobs; force will be met with force; a larger standing army will be demanded by public opinion and conceded by Congress; the power and rights of the States will be subordinated to the superior vigor and resources of the National Government; the duties of governors will be merged into the prerogative of the President. With the large standing Army acting as a national police, under the directions of an Executive whose authority will thus be as omnipotent as his troops will be omnipresent, the era of free government will have passed away, and the reign of despotism will have commenced. The sacred privileges of individual citizens will be lost in the general demand for a strong government, and all that freedom has gained by the heroic struggles of our forefathers for a thousand years, and by our resistance to tyranny for three centuries in the New World, will be put in peril.

Does he mean if we do not vote for his proposition, if we do not instruct the committee to report in thirty days, that the direful consequences that follow in his statement are to come upon us? No, sir; of course he does not intend that construction, as he says, "with a failure, however, to comprehend the situation it will come through convulsions and revolutions." Logically we have a right to expect that an argument made in support of a proposition should have some reasonable connection with it or the counter propositions. His does not apply to either, for the necessity of a revision of the tariff is advocated and admitted, and it is only a difference of opinion in regard to methods. The dreadful results, then, must be expected if the people of the United States insist on a protective tariff instead of free trade. In other words, if they are not sufficiently enlightened to make their own laws the Republic will prove a failure and despotism follow. I recognize the truth of some of the general propositions brought forward in the speech, but the gentleman takes counsel of his fears in his conclusion.

He does not consult his experience, and he seems to have little faith in the permanence of republican institutions or the stability of a republican government if he deems it necessary to introduce into a discussion like this such an alarming appeal to the lowest elements of society. I do not mean to make a personal application; but I do say that the gloomy picture he presents reminds me of the wailings of croakers and the extravagant declarations of demagogues in their stump speeches throughout the country at every election we are called upon to take part in. I wish that he had some of the faith that we are born with and that abides with us in the old Bay State. We find nothing in the history or traditions of the country, from the days of Plymouth Rock through all our troubles down to the present time, that leads us, in the discussion of such a question as this, to predict that the pillars of the temple are to be thrown down, or that the genius of the people is to be changed. This appeal of the gentleman, if it means anything, is an appeal for the Democratic party, presenting an exaggerated statement, to be used in partisan warfare if we do something or we do nothing, should there be any slight complication or disaster in the business relations of the country.

I have no sympathy for the men who in the halls of Congress legislate for this country with the doubts and fears so fastened upon them that in a tariff debate which concerns material interests, entirely under the control of the suffrages of the people who may change their opinions every decade, tremble lest "all that freedom has gained by the heroic struggles of our forefathers for a thousand years, and by our resistance to tyranny for three centuries in the New World, will be put in peril."

Let us rather appeal to the common sense and intelligence of the American people. Let us stand by the truth, without unsoundness or exaggeration. Let us admit that we shall make mistakes, that we shall have panics and failures, that life is a struggle with men and nations.

But differences of opinion on revenues and tariffs will not turn back the ages. Political differences of men or parties cannot arrest the upward and onward progress of our nation or change its civilization into barbarism. We cannot turn back into darkness the first light of the morning or stop the twinkling of the stars. I have faith in the great mass of the people.

I intended that my speech should be brief that I might allot a portion of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GODSHALK.] I will conclude with saying that while I advocate a tariff commission, and stand upon the platform of the Republican party and insist that a change of policy should be a growth and not a revolution, I claim it is the duty also of a commission of an intelligent people and the Congress of the United States, while they study the interest of our country, to investigate the wants and the productions of other countries, and, so far as it is consistent with the interest of our own, to arrange and adopt a tariff that will encourage an exchange of commodities with other nations of the world in the interest of commerce and civilization. I favor a conservative, wise, and judicious policy. We have not only to arrange a discriminating tariff, but to inaugurate a system sufficiently simple and comprehensive so that changes can be made without injustice, and we can learn when discrimination or protection becomes a monopoly. There have been many theoretical propositions from the other side that I do not dispute. We cannot shut ourselves up as individuals or a nation from the rest of the world. The days of the ascetic and recluse have passed away. Men no longer seek for the philosopher's stone in the solitude of the hermit's cell or the seclusion of the cloistered monastery; the healthiest minds and the most progressive thought is found in busy life in contact with the world, in the friction of mind with mind. As individuals or a nation we cannot live unto ourselves alone either in our commerce or our civilization.

The manifest destiny of the Republic is not alone to bless and elevate the people who live upon the soil and under the flag of the United States, but to extend her beneficent influences to the whole human race wherever they may dwell. [Applause.]

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GODSHALK.]

Mr. GODSHALK. Mr. Chairman, the title of the bill under consideration is a bill to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws. This bill has given rise to a very protracted discussion, a very small part of which only has been devoted to the bill itself.

I want to say generally, before I proceed to the discussion of this matter, that I am in favor of this commission, believing that in order to intelligently deal with the subject of the tariff we need additional light; we need all the information we can get through this commission. Believing that, I shall vote for this bill very cordially, and I am satisfied that a majority of the House, as soon as we can reach a vote, will vote in favor of this bill.

The discussion has been mainly upon the general policy of the Government as to a tariff. I want to read an extract from the report on manufactures by Alexander Hamilton, made December 5, 1791, in the early days of the Republic:

> This idea of an extensive domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil is of the first consequence. It is, of all things, that which most effectually conduces to a flourishing state of agriculture. * * * To secure such a market there is no other expedient than to promote manufacturing establishments. Manufacturers, who constitute the most numerous class after the cultivators of the land, are, for that reason, the principal consumers of the surplus of their labor.

Fisher Ames, of Massachusetts, in the debate on the first tariff bill in the House of Representatives in 1789, said:

> I conceive, sir, that the present Constitution was dictated by commercial necessity more than any other cause. The want of an efficient Government to secure the manufacturing interest and to advance our commerce was long seen by men of judgment, and pointed out by patriots solicitous to promote our general welfare.

Now there can be no dispute that we have had a great deal of discussion upon this tariff question. Ever since I have noticed anything in relation to political matters this subject of the tariff has been discussed. We have had any amount of theory upon the subject, and a person who had nothing more than theory, nothing more than the different views that have been held upon this subject, to form an opinion upon, might be in doubt up to the present time. But in addition to all that has been written and spoken upon this subject we have had ocular demonstration; we have seen this system tried, both sides of it.

This country has had low tariffs, has had tariffs for revenue, and also has had tariffs for protection, and that is the kind of tariff which is now in existence. Now, does any man pretend to say, who has lived for forty years and has observed the operation of these different systems upon the prosperity and happiness of the country—does any man pretend to say that we have succeeded better under a tariff for revenue alone than we have under our protective-tariff system?

Before proceeding further in the discussion of this question, I wish to say right here that I am in favor of a tariff which will secure to the American manufacturer the home market; and I would secure this not for the purpose of benefiting particularly the manufacturer or the laborer under him, but for the common good. My experience and observation have taught me to believe that all classes of the community share equally in the advantages resulting from a protective tariff.

It will be found, I apprehend, before long that the most difficult problem of statesmanship in this country will be to provide for labor at remunerative wages. We are receiving from foreign countries six or seven hundred thousand people every year. Of necessity we must have a great expansion of labor. We must find something for these people to do. How shall this end be attained? Why, sir, let us continue to encourage and expand home manufactures, and to increase our home products. A large proportion of emigrants will no doubt seek homes in the new States and Territories, and soon add largely to the agricultural productions of the country.

Look at the expansion of manufactures in this country under our present system. Many people undertake to say that manufacturers are a privileged class, enjoying great advantages over other portions of the community. What truth is there in that statement? Look at the progress of any particular branch of manufactures in this country that may be designated, and you will find that in its commencement it labored under great difficulties; it has progressed gradually. Often it has been retarded by unwise legislation. The consequence is that the capital which has been invested in manufactures in this country has not reaped a greater percentage of profit than has been yielded in other branches of industry.

Take the great staple of iron. Look at its history as we find it detailed in the census reports. Many and many attempts which have been made in the direction of producing and manufacturing iron have been attended with failure after failure. Great amounts of capital have been thus swallowed up and lost; yet we have to-day iron manufactures extended, with a production unequaled perhaps by any other nation on the face of the earth; and this result has been accomplished by continued effort, by wise legislation, looking toward the promotion and fostering of these industries. The constantly increasing uses to which iron is being adapted will insure a still larger consumption of it from year to year as time goes on, if home enterprise and competition continue to enlarge the production and cheapen the price.

Look at the great State of Pennsylvania; I take pride in referring to my own State in connection with this particular subject. I wish we had to-day the full returns of the census in regard to the manufactures of this country. They will show, I think, when they come to be published, an amount of progress and development that has never been equaled in any ten former years or any other country. They will show that we have great and important duties to perform here when we undertake to deal with this tariff question.

I have noticed that when Congress has been called upon to revise the tariff system it has generally, to use a homely phrase, "put its foot in it"—has made things worse than they were before. For that reason I am in favor of this commission, because we want more information on this subject before we undertake to reduce tariff duties on the ground that we have at the present time too much revenue, and that present duties are oppressive to the great mass of our population.

I was speaking of the iron industry of my own State. I believe that we are at this time producing 46 per cent. of all the iron manufactured in the United States. That is a great interest. It has grown up, as I have said, within the last one hundred years. It has grown from trifling importance until to-day there are in my Congressional district, in the county of Montgomery alone, five and a half millions of dollars invested in the iron business and three thousand hands employed, receiving annually $1,310,610 as wages, while the products of this manufacture are valued at $7,194,000. These are the statistics as to the county of Montgomery alone. The whole State presents probably the best specimen of the advantages of a protective tariff system to be found anywhere on the face of the globe within an equal area. The statistics will show that we are now manufacturing more iron than any other country, perhaps with the exception of Great Britain.

But there is still another subject to which I want to call attention. I have but a few minutes, and I do not propose to discuss this subject at any length, because I think that when we shall have something tangible before us in the shape of a tariff bill we may be better able to discuss details as to the rates of duties on specific articles. But it is contended, by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber and those who favor a reduction of the tariff rates, that such reduction would be for the benefit of the farmer. This is the only basis upon which an argument for the reduction of tariff duties can be based with even plausibility. It is contended here that there should be great haste, that the tariff should be immediately revised, because of its great burdens upon the people. Now, what evidence have we that this tariff is a burden upon the people? Are there any petitions here to that effect? Do we hear of any petitions before the Committee on Ways and Means complaining that the tariff is an oppressive measure and must be changed? Not at all; I know of nothing of the kind. The farmers are certainly not complaining. They have no reason to complain of the present tariff. I take the ground, Mr. Chairman, that a protective tariff is of no less importance to a farming community than to a manufacturing community. Certain it is that in no other part of the world are agricultural implements of such superior design and workmanship in common use as they are among us or can be obtained for the same outlay of money.

But for the ingenuity and enterprise of American mechanics, fostered and encouraged by our protective system, we should still in our agricultural operations be using the scythe and cradle of fifty years ago.

I suppose that this argument in favor of a reduction of the tariff is intended to be addressed mainly to the farmers occupying the new States of the far West and Northwest, because it is to that region alone that it could apply with any force. It is a fact, Mr. Chairman, and one which cannot be doubted, that only from States having a comparatively new soil, where farming can be carried on without the expense of manure or fertilizers, can the exportation of grain, even at present prices, be made profitable. It is a fact well known to all the farmers of Pennsylvania, at any rate, and I have no doubt to all the farmers of the Northern States generally, that in order to prosecute agriculture with any success there must be a home market, a market near at hand for the products of the farm. We do not pretend to compete with the farmers of the West in the price of grain. They can at present produce cheaper than we can. But there are so many manufacturing towns and cities in Pennsylvania needing constantly agricultural products of a varied character, fruit, vegetables, butter, cheese, pork, and other products of a high state of agriculture, that in this direction the farmers in my section of the country look for their revenues. Through all my life it has been the fact that whenever manufactures in the city of Philadelphia, for example, are at a low ebb, farm products are cheap and difficult to sell.

When men were employed at liberal wages they had means to buy, and they were not hard to deal with, but, on the contrary, were willing to pay good prices for agricultural products. As it was in Pennsylvania, so it was everywhere else.

In order to be made profitable, agriculture must have a market near its products. If any man supposes that agriculture in this country can be made profitable by the shipment of grain abroad, he labors under the greatest imaginable delusion. This, to my mind, is a proposition so clear that it needs but little argument.

There is another matter, Mr. Chairman, to which I wish to call the attention of this House. Suppose it should become the policy of this country to enter upon the prosecution of agriculture with a view mainly to the exportation of the products of the soil, what would be the effect? In a pamphlet which I have before me, written by Dr. Peter Collier for the Agricultural Review and Journal of the American Agricultural Association, dated April, 1882, and entitled, "Is our soil being exhausted?" I find the following very suggestive and important statement:

> From the data already presented in this article it appears to be established almost beyond question that, despite the very great inequalities of productiveness in the several sections of the country, which inequalities are doubtless largely due to inherent and original differences in the character of the soil, in part also to climatic conditions favorable or unfavorable to agricultural production, and in part also to better agricultural methods obtaining in some sections than in others, still it appears beyond doubt true that over large and most productive areas of our country the fertility of the soil has suffered appreciable diminution.
> If we contrast the New England and Middle States, for example, with those of the Central or the Northwestern and Western States, we shall find that although the former were but a few years ago surpassed in productiveness by the latter, during the short period of fifteen or twenty years the yield of the latter has fallen off, while that of the New England and Middle States has increased, so that at present the acreage yield of these New England and Middle States surpasses that of the Northwestern and Western States and of the Central States.
> We have then obviously one solution as to the important question. "How shall exhaustion of our lands be prevented?" The answer the above facts force upon us is: increase so far as possible home consumption of our agricultural products, and carefully preserve and return to our lands such portions of those products as are either not fed to the animal, or if fed, are not assimilated.
> None need to be reminded that this practice has been repeatedly urged upon the farmer, and indeed thousands of practical illustrations abound proving that profitable agriculture and productive lands are closely connected with flocks and herds.
> But if our present methods shall continue and our exportation of cereals increase, the time must come, unless our experience is to be wholly unlike that of other countries, when to increase the production of our lands we must at least have recourse to the same methods which have long obtained in Great Britain and upon the Continent, and in the New England, Middle, and Atlantic States of our own country, namely, the application to our soils of those mineral constituents which now are being so rapidly removed. When that time comes, as come it assuredly must without some modification of our methods, it will be found that the profitable production of the cereal crops at the prices we now obtain for them will be an impossibility. Indeed, already in many parts of the country the continued production of corn, as in the past, is found to be almost without profit, and there have sprung up many factories, hoping by its manufacture into other products to increase the profits in its production.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this condition of things is attributable mainly to the fact that a large portion of the United States has been farmed with a view to the exportation of our agricultural products. There has been no home market established, and as wheat and corn have been raised for exportation chiefly, the inevitable consequence has been that the fertility of the soil has become, in a measure, exhausted. If manufactures had been established universally throughout the country agriculture would have been profitable everywhere. Agriculture could be made profitable in the South if the South were to engage in manufactures as well as in agriculture.

While I am on this point, Mr. Chairman, let me call to the attention of the House that almost ever since the foundation of the Government two ideas have dominated the minds of Southern statesmen. One was the idea of the supremacy of State rights, and the other the doctrine of free trade. They continue even to the present day. We find most of the advocates of free trade come from that section of the Union.

Now, I do not wish to make any invidious comparisons between any sections of the country. I have no purpose to hurt the feelings of any single member representing any district, whether in the North or the South, the East or the West. My only purpose is to state what I believe to be palpable facts, so that whatever injury may have been done in the past may be remedied in the future. It is apparent that free-trade doctrines as taught in the South have kept that section of the country from advancing as rapidly as it should have done. They had, and can have, no diversified agriculture in the South until they have established manufactures in their midst.

I believe they can have no general prosperity until they open their coal fields, develop their mines, and invite labor and capital for the establishment of manufactures. Then that country, so favored by Providence with a mild climate and with fertile soil and almost unbounded resources of every character, will make an advance heretofore undreamed of. As one of the Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania I should be glad to see the South enter upon such a course of prosperity. It would inure not only to the benefit of that section but to the advantage of the whole country. We would then have something like unanimity of sentiment on this complicated subject of the tariff.

It is a somewhat curious fact, and one we ought to notice, that a reduction of the tariff is asked at this time in order to promote the importation of foreign goods, when if we carefully study the statistics of the United States we will discover we are receiving into this country at the rate of $800,000,000 of foreign productions every year. It seems to me that ought to satisfy even the great city of New York, through which most of that business is done. We ought not to consult the wishes and interests of the importers of the great city of New York alone, but we ought to consult as well the interests and welfare of our vast country and millions of people outside of that city.

The fact is, at this time the balance of trade is tending rapidly against the United States. The foreign goods which are imported every year will absorb the agricultural exports, and unless some favorable change soon takes place we may find, as in the panic of 1873, gold exchange will be against us. After that panic, as soon as the country recovered and exportations began to exceed importations, the shipment of gold began to be made to this country. Exchange now is in such a condition that it is very likely shipments of gold will begin to be made from this country to Europe. That may be the case this very week in the city of New York. We do not appreciate the great interests of the fifty millions of people engaged in every industrial avocation of life as we ought to do. We do not see them in their diversified labors. They are, however, the main stay of this country, and they should not be dominated by the selfish wishes of one or two commercial cities who want to see the tariff so changed that foreign goods may flow into this country in such vast proportions as still more largely to increase their enormous profits.

On the contrary, I am in favor of a policy that will give, as I said a moment ago, the home market to our own manufacturers; and in doing that we benefit every and all classes; we shall build up our manufactures, afford new fields for our labor, and by increasing the demand for labor we necessarily enhance its value and make all happy and prosperous.

I will be pardoned a little State pride when I say that I should be glad if every gentleman here interested in these questions would travel through Pennsylvania and get a bird's-eye view of what is going on there, and they will get a better idea of what the legislation of the country should be touching these great interests.

We talk here of the importance of this subject or the importance of that subject, but I venture to say that no man on this floor who will give the manifold questions which are more or less directly connected with the tariff the slightest attention can fail to come to the conclusion that we are now dealing with the most important interest that can possibly come before us. When the proposed commission have completed their labors, and we have their report before us, we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that we have done what we could to be fully informed as to the whole subject of tariff revision. Congress will not be bound to accept any of the conclusions at which the commission may arrive, but will still have absolute control of the whole matter.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, if we confine the discussion of the pending bill within the scope of its declared provisions we shall be relieved, for the present at least, from the consideration of the many details which must necessarily enter into any well-matured measure looking to the revision of the tariff.

I will not attempt to add to the reasons already so sufficiently presented in the progress of this debate why the Senate bill now under consideration should not be sanctioned by this House. Nor will I presume to anticipate the difficult and delicate task of reconstructing our tariff laws, which, in my judgment, should be devolved on Congress through the aid of the Committee on Ways and Means. In the remarks I propose to submit my endeavor shall be, without going over the ground already occupied, to show, if I may, that there are a few plain and simple rules logically deducible from the Constitution itself which should at all times be recognized, and which should govern and control in all tariff legislation, both now and hereafter.

From the very beginning of our Government, down to the present hour, the laying of impost duties has been a vexed question in American politics and one upon which public opinion is as much divided to-day as at any former period of Federal legislation. Hitherto the debates on this question, both in and out of Congress, have not only been conducted with great zeal but too often with bitter acrimony between the advocates of what is popularly known as free trade on the one hand and the friends of what is known as high protection on the other, both of whom, in my judgment, have abandoned the field of practical legislation and have lost themselves in the bewildering mazes of theoretic speculation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I frankly confess my inability to unravel the tangled thread of sophistry that runs through all the arguments of extremists on either side of this perplexing question, and I am profoundly convinced that we shall never arrive at safe and reliable conclusions until we escape from the beclouded region of mere speculative theory into the clear atmosphere of practical knowledge and experience.

It is admitted on all hands that the present tariff should undergo revision and reduction. Indeed it needs no argument to show that it is utterly impossible to devise a tariff law which will not require modification and revision from time to time, so as to accomodate its provisions to the varying conditions of the industries of the country and to the constant and unavoidable fluctuations in the commerce of the world. But I insist that these changes and modifications of our tariff system should be and can be regulated and controlled by a well-defined principle, which should never be disregarded.

As free trade, pure and simple, would drive the Government to the only remaining alternative of raising revenue by direct taxation, which may safely be assumed to be impossible in American legislation, it would be a needless waste of time to discuss it.

The advocates of high protection for protection's sake contend for a tariff that will enable our own manufacturers to drive from the home market all foreign competition. It would therefore, in my judgment, be injudicious and unwise to base American policy upon the views of either the advocates of free trade or of high protection. In this, as in all other cases characterized by extreme and contrary opinions, the only safe course will be found in the middle ground from which these extreme opinions diverge, and I submit that it is the duty of Congress to search for and find this middle ground, and having found it, to base all tariff legislation upon it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all who have carefully examined and weighed what has been said and written by speakers and pamphleteers on the subject of the tariff must have seen that the policy advocated by the free-trader tends to the monopoly of our home market by foreign producers, and that the policy of extreme protection as certainly tends to prohibition, and consequently to a monopoly of the home market by the domestic producer. In either case there would be a monopoly of supply which would enhance the price to the consumer and would so continue until such time as the supply shall exceed the demand. Whenever and as often as this is the case prices fall; but so long as either the domestic or foreign producer shall control the supply, prices will rule high until the demand shall fall below the supply.

Much has been said and written about a tariff for revenue only, and after a careful examination of the subject I have arrived at the conclusion that under the Constitution no tariff which exceeds the demands of revenue can be justified.

Now, if this be true, it becomes a matter of the first importance to inquire into the extent of the constitutional power of Congress to lay and collect taxes for revenue. The power to lay and collect taxes, as well as the methods by which it may be done, is clearly defined in the first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Now, it is clear and indisputable that whatever taxes are levied and collected for the purposes enumerated in this clause of the Constitution, by either of the methods therein provided, are strictly taxes for revenue alone.

Under this grant of power it devolves on Congress to provide the ways and means for the payment of the debts of the United States. The amount necessary for this purpose being a matter of simple arithmetical calculation leaves no room for question or debate; and necessarily all taxes collected for this purpose will be revenue within the meaning of the Constitution.

Congress is also clothed with the power to determine the amount necessary to be raised for the "common defense and general welfare." Now, the power to levy and collect taxes being limited to these purposes by the Constitution, it follows as an inevitable conclusion, resulting from the soundest philological interpretation of the language employed in that instrument, that the power to determine the amount of taxes necessary for such purpose lies in the sound discretion of Congress, and it also follows that whatever amount is thus collected will be in the strictest sense of the word for revenue.

If, then, Congress, under the Constitution, can alone determine the amount of revenue necessary to be collected for the payment of the debts and providing for the "common defense and the general welfare" of the United States, the question as to how much shall be collected for these purposes must necessarily rest in the sound discretion of Congress, and, keeping within the limitations of the Constitution, it becomes one of expediency and not of constitutional power. It is precisely at this point that divergent and conflicting opinions arise.

To illustrate: a bill has been reported to the House by its Committee on Naval Affairs (which I most earnestly hope may become a law during the present session) to increase and improve our Navy for the "common defense and general welfare," and it will devolve upon Congress to determine upon the expediency of such a measure, and if it shall be passed by both Houses and be approved by the President, whatever tax it may be necessary to levy and collect for such purpose will be a tax for revenue within the meaning of the Constitution. And so in regard to our coast defenses, the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and in aiding in the restoration of our merchant marine by giving compensation to American-built and American-owned iron or steel ships for carrying the mails to and from foreign ports, provided they are constructed under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, upon such models and of such material as will enable them to be readily converted into efficient ships of war when needed by the Government for such purpose, and to be sold to the Government at a reasonable price when so needed.

Appropriations made for these and for other purposes necessary for the "common defense and the general welfare" would be within the power conferred on Congress by the Constitution, and would be for revenue. Unless, therefore, Congress should transcend the power conferred by the Constitution by laying and collecting taxes outside of those enumerated in that instrument, its action must necessarily be within the revenue limit.

If this view of the question be correct, then it will be safe to conclude that the ascertainment of the amount of revenue that is necessary to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and the general welfare rests in the discretion of the two Houses of Congress, and that in the exercise of that discretion they can only be controlled by the Constitution; and if they overstep the limitations of the organic law they may be checked by the executive veto and the judicial power of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The framers of the Constitution, so far as they could, provided against hasty and improvident legislation by clothing the Executive with the veto power, and by requiring frequent elections, when the people have it in their power to correct any abuse growing out of unwise legislative enactments. It is, as I have already said and now repeat, when Congress undertakes to determine what is necessary for the "common defense and the general welfare," that we find ourselves embarrassed by widely differing and conflicting opinions, which differences and conflicts are liable to be renewed and intensified at every change in the administrative policy of the Government, and are, perhaps, as sharply defined at this very moment as at any former period in our national history.

In this state of things all thoughtful minds are inquiring what is best to be done. This is a question which to-day appeals to the judgment and patriotism of every member of Congress. It is no party question. It should not be made a party question, and I do not hesitate to proclaim that, in the present state of public opinion, if the tariff should be made the issue in a national election it would disintegrate if it did not disrupt existing political parties. There is one proposition, however, upon which all the political parties are agreed, and that is that the present tariff should undergo revision and reduction, and if the Congress in performing the task of revision shall confine its action within the constitutional limit of revenues, the only question which would remain open for debate would be as to what industries and to what extent the principle of incidental protection under a revenue tariff should be applied. It is not only the province but the duty of Congress to decide this question, and at as early a day as is consistent with a cautious examination of the subject in all its details, which task in my judgment can be performed through the appropriate committee of the House much sooner than through an outside commission to be appointed for that purpose; and I will add quite as thoroughly and intelligently, as all the facts and all the sources of information would be alike accessible to both committee and commission.

If in the performance of this duty Congress should overstep the limitations of the Constitution its action would be subject to the restraining power of the Executive veto, and, failing in that, it would have to stand the test of scrutinizing judicial investigation, and would be controlled by the judgment and decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. And so, also, hasty and improvident legislation may be arrested by the Executive veto, and can be corrected by the people at the ballot-box. With these salutary checks, it is almost impossible for Congress to make any permanent departure from the path of constitutional legislation.

But, confining the power to lay and collect taxes within the revenue limit, it remains for Congress to determine the measure of incidental protection to be given to such domestic industries as most need it, and, in the revision and readjustment of our tariff system, it should not be lost sight of but constantly kept in view.

Of our productions, manufactured and agricultural, amounting in value to about fourteen thousand millions of dollars, only between eight and nine hundred millions are exported to other countries, thus leaving thirteen thousand millions to supply the home demand.

These figures indicate the vast demand for our productions in the home market and for domestic consumption, and cannot fail to impress the minds of thoughtful statesmen with the importance of diversifying and encouraging our home industries.

Of course I do not suggest, nor do I advocate a policy, even if such a thing were possible, which would cause our domestic market to absorb all our productions. With a boundless area of land not yet reduced to cultivation, and a rapidly and ever-increasing supply of labor to reclaim it from the wilderness and make it productive; with inexhaustible mines teeming with undeveloped wealth, and with the marvelous expansion of our manufacturing industries, it is safe to conclude that our productions will increase in a ratio equal to the increase of our population, and that about the same relation between the home demand and our exports will be maintained in the future, and that whatever fluctuations may occur to disturb the equilibrium between them in any given year or series of years will result more from temporary causes, such as short production at home and abundant production abroad, or abundant or short production in both, as the case may be, than from any permanent changes in our commercial relations.

Whenever we have a surplus beyond domestic demand, that surplus will, as a general thing, be attracted by foreign demand, and by this unerring indicator we shall easily find the measure of exportation.

In considering this subject, therefore, we should be careful not to undervalue the importance of our home market, for this is the market which is least exposed to the contingencies and consequences of an ever possible disturbance of our foreign commercial relations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I confidently affirm that with our rapidly increasing labor it is impossible to increase the home demand for our surplus without distributing this increased and ever-increasing labor among different and diversified industries, so as to bring them all under the healthful operation of the law of demand and supply, and maintaining as near as may be possible the desired equilibrium between the two. This policy, if adopted and encouraged by the legislation of Congress, through a wise application of the principle of incidental protection within the limits of revenue, would doubtless result not only in increasing but in imparting stability to our home market.

How the home market can be best encouraged, maintained, and increased, and by what legislative policy this desirable end can be most surely accomplished, is a problem which can only find its solution in the action of the American Congress, and the sooner we enter upon a sober and careful investigation of the subject, the sooner we may hope to arrive at sound conclusions and judicious legislation. While no new policy should be entered upon rashly and inconsiderately, and so be left to all the chances of a wholly untried experiment, we may, in the light of past experience, and aided by a careful examination of the relations which our varied industries hold with trade and commerce, both foreign and domestic, be enabled so to apply the principle of incidental protection as to divert much of the labor of the country from less profitable employment into new channels of production, which would necessarily and therefore certainly strengthen and increase our home market, for the simple reason that the farmer must be clothed and the mechanic and manufacturer must be fed. To bring this about is, of course, beyond the power of arbitrary legislation—for there is no power in Congress to compel one man to produce any given raw material and another to convert it into forms adapted to the every-day uses of life. From this it will be seen that the only way in which Congress can contribute to the multiplication of employments is to legislate in such a manner as to encourage the redundant labor employed in any particular industry to engage in some other.

This, I know, will always be found to be a delicate and difficult task, and in some cases it may be impossible, in extending incidental protection, to avoid altogether the appearance of partial discrimination against some of the industries of the country. But it should be remembered that no laws of human enactment can be absolutely perfect, and if all legislation should be suspended until infallibility shall be reached every government on earth would be compelled to surrender the law-making power. Yet, because finite legislators cannot enact perfect laws is no reason why we should not attempt the nearest possible approximation to it.

The highest pinnacle to which national prosperity can climb will be attained in the ample production of everything required for domestic use and comfort, and beyond this the largest surplus possible to create in every branch of industry for the markets abroad, and the only way to encourage and aid in bringing about this desirable state of things by legislation, which I have been able to discover, is to apply the principle of incidental protection to such industries as cannot be born, or if born cannot maintain vitality and healthful growth without the fostering but prudent and guarded aid of legislation.

A new industry, confronted in its very birth with a monopolizing foreign competition, is like a new-born infant. We must feed it if we would have it live; we must nurture it if we would have it grow. To such an industry Congress is the wet-nurse, and upon it rests the maternal duty to provide it with proper food. It must neither be underfed nor overfed. If it be underfed, it will dwarf into a sickly existence and die; if it be overfed, it will grow into the ravenous monster called monopoly, and will ruthlessly prey upon all surrounding interests and industries. If we wish to utilize our undeveloped resources we must shape and adjust our legislation so as to bring them into fair and equal competition with foreign productions of a like class. To nurture our domestic industries to this extent is necessary to their healthful growth; to go beyond this would enable them to impair or destroy other interests that are equally entitled to the protecting care of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after all that has been said and written on the subject it is competition, however brought about, that cheapens the price to the consumer. Protection that drives away foreign supply gives monopoly to the domestic producer until domestic competition shall diminish prices. While on the other hand free trade, which opens wide our markets to the cheaper goods of the foreign producer, will give to him a monopoly of our domestic trade, the necessary tendency of which is to relieve importations of competition and thus enhance the price to the consumer.

Thus legislative encouragement to the extent indicated would not only give to the consumer the benefit of a healthful foreign competition, but would gradually and certainly bring into existence a domestic competition, which would lessen prices to the consuming class whenever and as often as supply shall equal or exceed demand. In other words, prices are controlled by the law of supply and demand. There is no escaping the force of this inflexible law of trade, and no legislation can relieve this or any other country from its inexorable demands.

I venture to lay it down as an unanswerable proposition that it is impossible to place a tariff duty upon any goods imported from abroad, for which there is a demand here, without affording protection to a greater or less extent to like goods manufactured in this country, which protection will continue until increased American production shall bring about a salutary competition among domestic producers. Now it must, I think, be apparent to every thoughtful mind that protection should never be carried to the extent of prohibition, nor even beyond the point necessary to create and maintain a healthful competition between domestic and foreign producers, and this, I confidently affirm, should be made the governing and controlling principle in the enactment of all tariff laws, both now and hereafter, Congress at all times confining its action within the limits of constitutional revenue.

To determine where this point lies will tax to the utmost the wisdom and experience of our ablest statesmen. It is, indeed, the most difficult and embarrassing task that can devolve on Congress, requiring, as it does, a familiar knowledge with all the varied industries of the country, their mutual relations and dependencies, and also a thorough acquaintance with foreign markets and productions, so that we may intelligently direct our efforts to the common advancement of our own interests and industries with the least possible hardship or injustice to any. One should not be fed and another starved, but all our industries should be encouraged and fostered by the judicious and wise action of Congress in applying the principle of incidental protection within the limits of a constitutional revenue, and upon the basis of that benign maxim "to live and let live," which should pervade all the relations of life, and of society, and of business as well.

To bring the various industries of the country into that nice adjustment which shall make them helps instead of hinderances to each other will be no easy task, and may perhaps be impossible of perfect accomplishment; but this is no reason why a constant and earnest effort should not be made in the legislation of the country to bring every wheel in the complicated machinery of labor, capital, production, trade, and commerce into harmonious and helpful co-operation.

I undertake to affirm that much may be accomplished in this direction by wise and timely legislation, and deem it not only appropriate but safe to leave this important work in the hands of Congress, which can through its committee call to its assistance the knowledge of the most experienced financial and commercial minds of the country; and in this connection I do not hesitate to declare that if we hope, through the medium of legislation, to aid in the great and important work of harmonizing all our material industries and producing interests, we must withdraw from the field of speculative theory and come squarely down to the practical teachings of experience.

Have we any resources not yet developed which might be made to contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the country? Are the products which might be derived from them in demand among our own people? If so, why do they remain dormant? The answer is, that the demand for them is supplied by the foreign producer cheaper than they can be made here. Why is this so? It is because the cost of production is cheaper abroad than at home. How is this inequality to be remedied? I answer, it is, at least to some extent, to be remedied by affording incidental protection within the limits of a revenue tariff until the home products shall be brought into fair competition with the foreign product.

It is said, and truly said, that the cost of transportation for the foreign product is itself a protection to the home product; and I am ready to admit that in many cases and in regard to many industries it affords all the protection that is needed, but there are other domestic industries that cannot, even with the advantage of transportation in their favor, successfully compete with the foreign. In all such cases, in my judgment, incidental protection should be added to transportation until a fair and equal competition shall be brought about between the domestic and foreign product, not more for the benefit of the producer than for the ultimate advantage of the consumer, who will in the end realize all the benefit which must necessarily result from competition.

It is urged that the consumer pays the duty, and doubtless this is generally the case, although it is well known that this is not always or necessarily the case. But suppose it to be true, that the consumer pays an enhanced price to the extent of the protection given, would it be wise; would it be provident to leave any resource of our own which is capable of yielding what we want and what we consume to a devouring foreign monopoly to the extent of the sum total of American demand? With the rapidly multiplying millions of our population, which by the end of the next century may (as I trust without Chinese immigration) equal that of China at the present time, would it be wise to adopt such a legislative policy as will strangle American enterprise by preventing the multiplication and vigorous growth of our own industries?

I do not mean to say that American industries are to be fed perpetually on protection pap, nor do I mean to say that protection should be given through an import tax outside of strictly revenue limits; but I do mean to assert most emphatically that within those limits a judicious and reasonable discrimination ought to be made in favor of infant industries until they grow into a sturdy maturity, which will enable them to leap into the arena of trade and commerce full armored and equipped for a fair and equal contest with all foreign competitors. We must not recoil from a policy that looks to the advantage and prosperity of our common country in the future simply on account of a present inconvenience. We must remember that we are not living for the present generation alone. We must consider that the unborn millions who are to come after us will receive as a heritage the country and its interests, as each preceding generation shall leave them, and that every generation will sit in judgment upon those that have gone before, and will hold them responsible for the manner in which they have discharged their duties and obligations to posterity.

We must learn to look through and beyond the immediate effect of any given policy to its ultimate results, and not be deterred from making the effort to secure a final and permanent good to the whole country by mere temporary inconvenience.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I wish to state by way of recapitulation the several propositions submitted in the remarks I have made. They are as follows:

1. That it is the duty of Congress to revise the present tariff with as little delay as is consistent with an intelligent execution of so important a task.

2. That the extreme views which are entertained on both sides of the question would be unwise and unsafe as a basis for tariff legislation.

3. That the free-trade policy if carried to its logical results would expose us to a ruinous competition with the cheap labor production of foreign countries.

4. That protection when it goes beyond the point of fair competition with foreign labor and production tends to monopoly of the home market to the disadvantage of the consumer, and will continue to do so until domestic competition shall reduce prices.

5. That there is a medium between free trade and high protection which, if adopted and carried out in our legislation, will foster our domestic industries and encourage the development of our internal resources by placing our productions on a fair and equal footing with those of foreign countries, thus giving to the consumer in this country all the advantage arising from the healthful operation of the well-known laws of trade.

6. That fair and equal competition, whether it be domestic or foreign, is the only thing that can be relied on to keep down prices to the consumer, and that a tariff that either destroys or seriously impairs such competition cannot do otherwise than increase the price to the consumer.

7. That the shifting and ever-changing relations of our trade with foreign countries, influenced as those relations must always be by the inexorable operation of the law of supply and demand, and other causes, it will be impossible to establish a permanent system of tariff duties, but we must expect from time to time to be obliged, as we are now, to modify, revise, and change it.

8. That all tariff legislation, both now and hereafter, should be based upon a constitutional revenue "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," with incidental protection to encourage a diversity of labor employment, and the development of our internal resources, and so to increase and render more stable our home market, upon which our prosperity must always mainly depend.

Mr. HATCH addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HATCH, on concluding, yielded the remainder of his time to Mr. CABELL.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allowed me I shall attempt no lengthy disquisition upon the science of government or the teachings of political economy as expounded by modern reformers, nor yet will I weary the House with a long array of facts and figures. I wish only to give expression to a few of the practical ideas that strike "a man from the country" upon consideration of the subject presented. Upon examination of this bill, I might ask what do the movers of it wish us to do? And then promptly answer, nothing. For that, Mr. Chairman, seems to be plain. If we pass it, what do we accomplish? Delay; nothing more. The bill provides for the appointment by the President of a commission composed of nine gentlemen to consider and report a revision of the present tariff laws.

Every fair man admits that the tariff laws should be revised, that the present system compels the consumers of the South and West to pay a tribute of from 38 to 104 per cent. more for the goods of Northern and Eastern manufacturers than for goods imported under wholesome laws. No intelligent man can fail to see that the Northern and Eastern States have grown rich and powerful from the bounties levied in their interest upon the labor of their Southern and Western neighbors, and that the great body of the people have been reduced to the condition of "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the manufacturers and monopolists who dominate the country through the operations of the protective-tariff system.

No one in this advanced age except an infatuated protectionist can understand why the people of this country should be compelled to pay the domestic manufacturer an extreme rate for goods when the importer, under prudent regulations, could offer the same or better articles for less money. Why should one portion of the people be required to build up and enrich the other when that other makes no return in kind? Or why should the great farming interest be grievously taxed to sustain the manufacturing interest when the latter makes no corresponding return? True, they ought all to labor together for the common good; but that is contrary to the very essence of the protective system, which requires the agricultural and laboring classes to pay exorbitant rates to the manufacturers of the country to the end that the latter may not be undersold by the importer.

What boots it to the laboring-man whether he buys of the domestic manufacturer or the importer? He wants the goods, he has them to pay for, and if the manufacturer will not sell on reasonable terms, he should be allowed to buy where and from whom he can buy cheapest. But it is said unless you "protect" the manufacturer he cannot do business, cannot increase the trade and commerce of the country, and cannot give employment to labor. All business should be reasonably protected, but a business which cannot sustain itself in this day and time ought to go down. If men do business they should conduct it at their own cost, unless they share the profits with those who contribute to their success, and ample and profitable employment for labor can always be found when the application is inspired by enterprise, and the community of profit is the principle. Labor is never dignified and is never properly or profitably employed when there is no community of interest between the employer and employé, when the one is elevated to the position of monopolist and the other reduced to poverty by starvation wages.

But we must have a commission, a body of experts, to settle this business. Where did we get the authority to create this commission? What did we come to Congress for? What did the people send us here for? Why were we clothed with great legislative and representative trusts except for the discharge of the people's business? Have not the subjects of finance and the tariff been the issues mainly discussed before the people for several years? Did not every man in this House hold himself out to his constituents as an "expert" in matters of tariff, and an adept upon the subjects of banking and currency, and as willing to assume and able to perform every duty incumbent upon a respectable representative of an intelligent people? Some of those promises, I admit, may have been imprudent and rash to the last degree, but still they were made by "willing souls," and relied upon by trusting constituencies, "else many of us had not been here."

Now, after all these promises and assertion of ability to discharge lofty trusts, to right wrongs, and reform abuses, it hardly looks decent for us to turn around and confess to our constituents and the country that a mistake was made, that the wrong men were sent to Congress, that in fact we are unable to grapple with the tariff, to compass any reforms, to lighten any burden, and to abolish that war-born, devil-christened system of internal taxation which hangs like a nightmare upon an oppressed and long-suffering people. No, Mr. Chairman, we have had one commission in the history of this country. That "eight to seven" business was quite enough. The American appetite craves no more. The results of this commission will be no more palatable than those of the former, even if worked out by "five to four." Again, Mr. Chairman, I cannot regard this desire for a tariff commission in any other light than as a scheme for delay. It is but a mere pretext to put off that labor which it is our present duty to perform.

Gentlemen who are opposed to any revision or reduction of tariff duties seem all to favor this commission. Refer the question this session, if you please, to the chosen nine; when you return next session you will find the work unfinished, or, if finished, so crudely and imperfectly done, according to the estimate of those who want delay, that the results will be rejected or another commission formed, and finally, after much delay, the country suffering the meanwhile all the troubles of the present obnoxious system, it will be concluded, what we all know now, that Congress has no right to abdicate its powers and prerogatives or to evade its duties and turn them over for performance to a roving commission of nine gentlemen, a majority of them appointed perhaps in one interest only, and whose work, if adopted, when completed may leave us in a worse condition than now.

The idea is becoming too common that when a difficult question presents itself Congress must evade its duty, avoid the labor, and impose it upon a committee or commission of "experts." The people are not so blind as many suppose, and they are beginning to see what is going on here. I tell you, gentlemen of the Republican side of the House, who are the main advocates of this commission bill, that if you continue much longer to "do those things which you ought not to do, and to leave undone the things which you ought to do," for example, if you fail to aid us in reducing taxation and insist upon resigning our trusts to others, as by this bill you propose, the next election will produce an "old-fashion shaking up," which will result in the selection of others than those now gracing seats in this Hall, and I would commend this goodly admonition to some of the "erring brothers" on our own side of the House.

Mr. Chairman, it is absurd to say that Congress cannot attend to and properly dispose of this matter. I know it involves labor, but the Committee on Ways and Means should be required by this House and the country to formulate a proper bill and present it for consideration. That committee, composed of eminent gentlemen of rare abilities and varied attainments, can surely present a measure of reform preferable to the present bill of abominations known as the "Morrill tariff." The fact is, Mr. Chairman, any change of laws, any system of reform of the subject, would be hailed as healthy and of benefit. The action of the Ways and Means Committee in presenting this bill is, I humbly submit, unjust to the House and country and unworthy that great committee itself. It is idle to say that the committee is unequal to the task of revising the tariff. The failure to present measures of relief and reform by the committee is due to the indisposition of the Republican party, in the majority in Congress, to revise the tariff in the interests of the toiling masses of the people rather than to the want of necessary information and ability upon the part of the members of the committee.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask whether the influence of which he speaks controlled the action of the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, in which the Republican party was in the minority and the Democrats in the majority?

Mr. CABELL. Unfortunately, during the time spoken of, we had an element in our party in Congress in sympathy with the bad tariff ideas of your Republicans, and who in company with your party prevented us from accomplishing many good things which we desired and the country greatly needed.

Mr. KELLEY. Do not hold the Republican party responsible for the action of your bad "black sheep;" that is not fair.

Mr. CABELL. It avails nothing to speak of the "black sheep" in the flocks of long ago; we are far more concerned in looking after the actions and watching the maneuvers of the flock of "black sheep" which you have in charge now.

Mr. SPRINGER. Whose wool is presumed to be protected at the rate of 45 per cent., which does not protect at all.

Mr. KELLEY. To borrow the eloquent expression of my friend from New York, it was the Democracy, not the Republicans, that cried "baa!" "baa!" through those Congresses.

Mr. CABELL. Yes, and many of the sheep of your party are crying that now, while the remainder are upholding a miserable system which is dragging this country to ruin.

Mr. Chairman, the country demands tariff reform now. A tariff which is prohibitory in many of its features, which tends to the building up of monopolies and monopolists, which takes from the farmer and the mechanic the proper returns for their labor, which enriches the few at the expense of the many, which paralyzes industry and robs labor of its honest toil, should be considered, revised, and modified at the earliest possible day.

What with parching droughts, failing crops, overflowed lands, widespread ruin, and withering taxes, our people are in no humor to longer tolerate oppressive laws. We have an overflowing Treasury. The Government is rich, the people are poor. Last year we had some $62,000,000 surplus in the Treasury; this year we will have from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and fifty millions. The Government's debts and liabilities are daily decreasing; its income and revenues are hourly increasing. Why, then, not inaugurate some measures for the country's relief now rather than be looking up new and useless modes of expenditure? Let Congress act now, and make the system a tariff for revenue only. I know that we cannot have absolute free trade, but we can lay the taxes to the extent of the Government's wants, and no more. The industries of the country require no other protection than that which will incidentally result from a well and justly regulated tariff system. Abolish now and forever that obnoxious and degrading system known as the internal-revenue laws of the country. Especially, take the tax from tobacco and spirits. Free the products of certain sections from impositions not levied upon those of others. Call in the political pimp, the spy, the informer, the gauger, the collector, and the marshal, and give once more freedom and rest to a people long harassed by the galling workings of a system born of the suggestions of civil commotion and executed since in the light of all the bad passions engendered by an unhappy fratricidal war. If we fail, the country will seek to know whose fault it is that needed reforms are not made, and will place it where it belongs, upon the Republican party, now in control of every department of the Government. In the canvass of 1880 the tariff and internal-revenue laws were largely discussed, and it was well understood that persistent efforts were to be made to reform those laws by whichever party succeeded to power. The Republicans prevailed. Congress assembled. Instead, however, of reform, we have had nothing but an effort at delay.

The outcome of all the labors of our Ways and Means Committee has been this tax-commission bill, nothing more. The efforts of our Democrats upon the committee, aided, perhaps, by one or two liberal Republicans, to reduce taxation have been thwarted and stifled. It is true that a sub-committee of the Ways and Means at one time agreed to report a reduction upon tobacco and spirits; and it is also true that the whole committee, or a majority of all, would have agreed to report the measure to the House, but party exigencies directed otherwise. All of a sudden—whether at the instance of I know not, but certainly in the interest of monopolists—and to the great damage of the taxpayers of the country, the caucus of the Republican party in Congress, on the 15th day of March last, determined that taxation upon tobacco and spirits should be neither abolished nor reduced the present session. Why, sir, the old and experienced chairman of Ways and Means, [Judge KELLEY,] who seemed much interested, and was regarded as one of the leaders of the movement for the abolition or reduction of these onerous taxes, at the first crack of the caucus whip turned a nimble somersault, falling among and upon the very bosoms of his late opponents, and was soon gracefully leading the members of his committee in their "advance backwards" upon the hopes and promises which but a short time before they had been holding out to the country.

The responsibility for the failure to report any tariff bill and to reduce or abolish internal taxation must rest upon and remain with the Republican majority in Congress. They have the power of the Government; they control legislation; they have refused and still refuse either to revise the tariff or to reduce taxation, notwithstanding the times, the circumstances, and the means, to say nothing of the pleadings of the people for relief, all conspire to call for prompt remedial legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican party of this country cannot escape, and should not be permitted to escape, the fearful responsibility which its members and representatives in Congress assumed when they refused as the people's agents to lighten the people's burdens.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to follow the example of many of the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate and engage in the discussion of the relative merits of free trade, a tariff for revenue only, or of a protective tariff. These have all been subjects of discussion at times during the entire history of the Government. They have engaged the attention of the ablest statesmen of the nation, and this whole field of debate has been traversed over and over again. I can add nothing new upon this old and interesting subject. Such a discussion when the tariff bill itself is under consideration will be proper and legitimate, but to-day it is entirely outside of the object I have in view in addressing the committee. My purpose is to speak to the pending bill and the propriety of its passage. What is that bill? What are its provisions?

When amended, as it is proposed to be by the Committee on Ways and Means, it provides that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a commission, consisting of nine members, to be called the tariff commission. Those members are to be selected from civil life and are to receive for their services, when engaged in actual duty, $10 per day each, with their traveling and other necessary expenses. They are authorized to appoint a stenographer and messenger. The compensation and expenses of the commission are to be audited and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury. The duties of said commission are to take under consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff upon a scale of justice to all interests. For this purpose the commission may visit different portions or sections of the country. They shall make their final report of the results of their investigation, and of the testimony taken, not later than the first Monday of December, 1882; but the testimony taken by them is to be printed from time to time and distributed to the members of Congress by the Public Printer. Such, in brief, are the provisions of the pending bill.

In determining whether it should receive the favorable consideration of the House, the first question to settle is this: Is there any necessity for a revision of the existing tariff laws? Upon this question there can be but one opinion. The act of June 30, 1864, found in volume 13 of the Statutes at Large, page 302, and covering some thirteen pages of that volume, is the basis of the present tariff system. It imposes duties upon a great number and variety of articles. At the time of its passage the nation was engaged in a gigantic civil war, the continent trembled with the march of contending armies, and the national life depended upon the result of the conflict. We were overwhelmed with a great and constantly increasing debt, the imperative necessities of the Government demanded money, and this act was passed to supply in part that demand.

In the selection of the articles upon which duties should be imposed, and in fixing the rate they should pay, the framers of that law kept constantly in view not only the revenue which was to be derived therefrom, but also the encouragement of American industries and the protection of American labor. The grand results which have followed from its passage have abundantly vindicated the wisdom and the statesmanship of its authors. But, sir, although its provisions were well adapted to the time and the circumstances under which they were passed, yet after the lapse of eighteen years, with the great and marvelous changes which have taken place in the nation, it is natural and reasonable to suppose that some modification is necessary to adapt it to the changed condition of the country. Let me not be understood as asserting that no changes have been made in the tariff laws since June 30, 1864. Amendments from time to time have been made, but no such careful and thorough revision as the great importance of the subject and the changed condition of the nation and of our various industries require. Had I the time and you the patience, I could point out and call attention to some of the defects and incongruities of the present laws, but, sir, that seems unnecessary for the purpose of this argument.

It is conceded by all that these laws need revision. Those who favor free trade, or a tariff for revenue only, or a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, or a tariff with high protective duties—all admit there are imperfections in the existing laws that demand correction. Duties in some instances might be increased, in others reduced. Articles now admitted free should, perhaps, pay duties and many that are now paying duties should be placed upon the free list. In many particulars the laws are uncertain, indefinite, and ambiguous. One construction is claimed by the importers, another by the Treasury Department, and, as a result, the dockets of our courts are crowded with cases in which the true construction of these laws are in issue; thus embarrassing the Treasury Department in their execution, annoying and delaying importers, and disturbing the business of the country. This condition of things ought not to continue, and it is the duty of Congress at the earliest possible moment to correct the evils which exist in the present laws.

How shall this be done? It is claimed by some of our Democratic friends on the other side of this Chamber that the Committee on Ways and Means should at once and without delay begin the work. If so, what reasonable excuse, let me ask, can they offer to this House and the country for their failure to modify and amend these laws? In the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses their majority in this House, where under the Constitution all revenue bills must originate, was unquestioned; their power was supreme. The same errors, inequalities, and ambiguities existed in the tariff laws which exist to-day; yet, in the six years they were in power, with the single exception of placing quinine on the free list, they left these laws as they found them—unchanged, unimproved, and there they stand as a monument to their insincerity to-day, or to their incapacity or inability to deal with this subject in the past. Now they arraign a Republican Committee on Ways and Means and a Republican House for not doing at its first session what they failed to perform during the six years they were in power. Every argument offered both against this commission and in favor of a revision of the present tariff by the Committee on Ways and Means is either an admission that the Republicans are superior to them in wisdom or that they in the last three Congresses were culpably guilty of negligence in the performance of an important public duty. Take which horn of the dilemma they choose, they are impaled upon the one or the other.

But to return to my question: How shall these tariff laws be revised? Shall it be done by the Committee on Ways and Means without or with the aid of this commission? The proper answer to this question will depend upon the policy which is to be adopted by the Government. If we believe in the doctrines enunciated by many of the gentlemen upon the other side of this House who have addressed the committee, that our true policy as a nation is to adopt free trade, then I frankly admit this commission is unnecessary. A simple act could be passed repealing all laws imposing customs duties, discharging all customs officers, closing all our custom-houses, and opening all the ports of the country to the free and unrestricted importation of the products of all countries and climes, and at the same time imposing direct taxes upon the people to supply deficiency in the revenue occasioned by the loss of import duties, and the work would be accomplished. We certainly need no commission for this; and I concede that from a free-trade stand-point opposition to this measure is consistent and legitimate.

Again, sir, if in the contemplated revision of these laws, as it has been claimed, revenue and revenue only is the sole object to be attained, the only end to be kept in view, and that all else is outside of our constitutional limits, and therefore must be ignored and excluded, then, also, the creation of this commission is unnecessary. Those gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber who have expressed such views and opinions and have advocated the adoption of such a policy are justified in their opposition to the passage of this bill. To secure the object they desire it is only necessary to ascertain from the various Departments the amount of revenue required to meet the current expenses of the Government, to pay our large and constantly increasing pension-roll, and the interest on our public debt; then enact a law imposing a duty upon a few articles not produced in our own country which our people must necessarily have—such as tea, coffee, and the like—and fix the rate of duty so as to encourage importations, and thereby produce the revenue required. But, sir, neither the doctrine of free trade nor a tariff for revenue only is to become the settled policy of this Republic.

In the last Presidential contest the issue between the American system of protection and free trade and a tariff for revenue only was sharply defined, thoroughly discussed by the press and upon the stump, and a verdict rendered by the American people in favor of the former by the triumphant election of Garfield and Arthur. This result was an emphatic indorsement of the principles long held and advocated by our party; and the Republican majority in this House now, as in the past, will stand firmly by these principles in their legislation upon this subject. In any revision of these laws made by them they will seek not only to secure the requisite amount of revenue to answer the purpose of the Government, but will also seek, not to prevent or destroy, but to create and develop new industries; not to cripple and embarrass, but to encourage and promote those already established, and above and beyond all will they seek to protect American labor, no matter in what department of industry it may be employed, from competition with the cheap and servile labor of foreign countries. Such a revision at this session, I am well satisfied, cannot be made. Before we enter upon this great work the most careful and thorough investigation of all questions—in the language of this bill—relating to our agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests, so far as the same may be affected by the legislation proposed, should be made and the results of that investigation laid before Congress.

We should be furnished with all the information attainable in relation to every industry to be affected, of their dependence one on the other, and of their relation one to another, so that no part of our complicated industrial system should suffer or be sacrificed by the change. To perform this great work wisely and well we need all the knowledge and all the light that we can possibly obtain; and I believe, through the instrumentality of this commission, the facts and statistics upon these various subjects, which shall be collected and laid before us, will be of incalculable benefit to the Committee on Ways and Means and to this House when the work of the tariff revision is under consideration. Favoring, as I do, a careful, well-considered, and thorough revision of our tariff at the earliest practicable moment, believing that no such revision will or can be made at the present session, I shall cheerfully vote for this commission with the fullest confidence that the result of its labors, when laid before the House and the country, will afford ample justification for its creation.

Mr. MARTIN, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Chairman, I have very little respect for the bill which is now the subject of discussion, and I should have less if it had originated in this House, for I concur in the general sentiment that it is the duty of this House to originate revenue bills. That the former Congress, or the Congress before that, or the Congress before that, failed to originate or perfect a measure for the reform of our tariff system is no excuse for us.

I am content for one to feel that the Committee on Ways and Means as now constituted could very well have performed this duty. I do not care how the President may constitute this commission, he never could find a protectionist more perfectly confirmed in his opinion than the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. KELLEY.] And when the President comes to select a representative of the commercial and the agricultural interests of the country upon this commission, as he will be bound to do by the terms of the measure, I do not believe he can find anywhere a better qualified gentleman for membership of the commission than we have on the Ways and Means Committee in the person of the honorable gentleman [Mr. CARLISLE] who led off in opposition to this bill.

And for one I think the honorable chairman, if he was in favor of this commission rather than an act for the immediate revision of our tax system, made a fatal mistake, looking to the dignity and character of this House.

I confess I am not surprised to find men willing to escape any responsibility for legislation in this House, for we have reached a point when it seems almost impossible to perfect any measure, whether it be the fault of our rules or the administration of our rules, or whether it be because we all bring to our legislative work only representative opinions. I am inclined to think it is quite as much the latter as the former.

I have been very much struck, Mr. Chairman, with this whole course of debate. I have not heard from any honorable member on this floor what I consider a practical discussion of this question. I say it with all reserve and with great respect for the honorable gentlemen who have participated in this debate; but I confess when I find at this period of our public life an endless discussion of the abstract theory of free trade, or of the abstract theory of protection, and day after day exhausted in that discussion, I not only mourn the absence of novelty, but, except in a few instances of those honorable gentlemen gifted with wit and humor, who have been able to give a more or less ludicrous exhibition of our revenue system, and a more or less ludicrous exposition of its details, with those exceptions I have not only found no novelty but I have found a discussion which, whether on this side of the House or on the other side of the House, exhausted itself in the abstract theories of the schoolmen and political philosophers. What is the alternative if we adopt the free-trade theory? Where will we all land if we take the argument of certain gentlemen on this side of the House, who, if left free to follow their own opinions and their own consciences, would give us absolute freedom of trade? In this view of the question, where would you get your revenue? Would you resort to direct tax? How many honorable gentlemen on this floor are ready to-day to raise $350,000,000 by direct tax? I address myself especially to my own political friends and associates; how many of you are willing to raise $350,000,000 by direct taxation? How many are willing even to raise it by an income tax, supposing an income tax is not a direct tax?

Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentlemen who introduce that opinion would lead us to the very result of the honorable gentlemen on the other side who go for protection per se. What is to become of this Government if you follow out the principle of protection? If there be no limit, if you may take the bill you have now upon the statute-book and carry into all the items the rule which you have applied to your wool tax and your iron tax, what is to become of your revenue? As often happens in life, these extremes meet, but no statesman in this country, as far as I am acquainted with its history, ever committed himself to any such mode of adjusting tariff taxation. We may take the father of the American system, and all the bright and distinguished men who followed in his wake, and who for twenty years led a great political party on that issue, and not one of them, either in the tariff of 1816, or 1824, or 1828, or 1832, ever presented to you such a monstrous example as we now have in the tariff of 1866, and which finds its defenders on this floor.

No man who ever lived in the history of this country and was recognized as a commanding statesman, capable and fit to give opinion to the country, ever entertained the idea of prohibitory taxation. A few wild, illogical, inconclusive enthusiasts, who represented the opinions of their districts, who came to this floor to recommend themselves to a single constituency, whether it was a manufacturing constituency of iron or of wool or of cotton, a few such men have proclaimed their willingness to levy a tax to prohibition, and, if need be, to waft the money to the waves if it was not wanted in the Treasury. I have heard of such enthusiasts as would lay the tax for the sake of protection, although they had to give the money away, whether to the States or to wasteful schemes of expenditure. But such men stand as monuments of wild folly in legislation and without the respect of the country for practical statesmanship.

And I consider precisely the same result would be produced by those who, forgetting or ignoring the practical lessons of the day, go to take refuge with these schoolmen, whether of Rhode Island or Connecticut, whether professors of Harvard or of Yale.

Are we to receive our political lessons from these schoolmen and professors, or are we to receive them from our own experience as practical legislators under our own responsibility to raise the revenue necessary to maintain the credit of the country?

Mr. Chairman, I look upon it as a great responsibility, and I consider the credit of this country of infinite value to it. I consider that my first duty as a legislator is to look to the credit of the Government, and therefore it is my first duty to look to revenue for the country.

And when I come to look for a revenue I have but one question to consider, and that is how shall I best obtain it, whether by one system of taxation or another? Shall I have it by direct taxation, by internal-revenue taxes, or by a tax on imports? That is the only question I am called upon to consider.

Now, just here I am frank to say that of the three systems I prefer the impost tax; and I never knew in the history of this country a public man who made any other choice. There is not to be found in the history of this country a statesman who ever lived, and who reached the responsibility of government, who did not prefer the tax on imports to either a direct tax or internal-revenue taxes.

The objection I take to this bill is that it does not proceed to revise the tariff or reform the revenue laws. That is what this House ought to do. This House should without delay, before it adjourns, give us a revenue tariff. Give us a revenue system of tariff where every article shall be taxed according to the revenue it produces, and, if you please, according to the maximum of revenue which it produces.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a single question at this point?

Mr. McLANE. I will yield to the gentleman for any question or correction which he desires to make, but I want my time.

Mr. KELLEY. I will guarantee to the gentleman that his time shall be extended beyond any that I may consume.

Mr. McLANE. Very well.

Mr. KELLEY. You have spoken of the two systems. Now, my belief is that the internal-tax system involves in this country, as it does in England, countervailing duties, and that a revision of the tariff would not be permanent until the internal taxes shall have been levied so as not to require a large class of countervailing duties.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I will wander very far from that statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I was about saying that it was the duty of that honorable gentleman as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, if he could obtain a majority vote in the committee, to bring in a bill here to revise both the tariff on imports and the internal-revenue system, and to produce that harmony between the two which is easy to produce; and not only to do that, but to give the country an assurance that the internal-revenue tax should be effaced altogether as soon as it possibly could be.

Mr. KELLEY. Amen.

Mr. McLANE. And I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, long as his public service has been closely identified with this system, he would have done himself in my opinion far more honor if he had relieved the country of the internal-revenue tax than he has ever in his past life obtained by imposing upon it these excessive imposts. He will stand responsible for the one through all time, and he will never have the credit for the other. He has missed his only opportunity, and we who would have followed his lead stand here to-day with no other right than that to protest against his weakness if he yielded his own judgment and his error if he did not see the truth.

Mr. KELLEY. One moment, if the gentleman pleases. It is not well to write epitaphs until the subject be dead. But if I might dictate mine, it would be, "Here lies a man who, when war required it, taxed everything from which money could be extracted, and who lived long enough to have led a movement for obliterating every war tax in the nature of excise." [Applause.]

Mr. McLANE. Gentlemen had better not applaud too soon. I would add to that, for fifteen years after the war he struggled to the utmost to maintain all those war taxes.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman mistakes. I, without any aid on the Democratic side, have agitated for the repeal of those taxes during the whole fifteen years.

Mr. McLANE. I am not talking about the internal-revenue taxes now. I had passed that topic and I was talking about the tax on imports; and I said that fifteen years after the war the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania had stood against all reduction, or against the material reduction of those war taxes. They stand there to-day. This tariff of 1866, abominable as it is, is the war tax which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has sustained for the last fifteen years.

Mr. KELLEY. The tax to which I refer is that of 90 cents upon the farmer who ventures to manufacture a peck of his corn; a tax of 90 cents on a peck.

Mr. McLANE. And the tax I refer to is the tax of 90 per cent. on the poor man's blanket which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has steadfastly maintained for the last fifteen years.

Mr. BLAND. The one is on the poor man's whisky; the other is on his blanket.

Mr. DINGLEY. How about the poor man's sugar?

Mr. McLANE. I was saying when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I wanted a tariff composed as a revenue tariff. I want every article taxed to the revenue standard, if need be to its highest standard; when I say "if need be," I mean if that much revenue is required; and inasmuch as I am in favor of repealing the internal-revenue tax as soon as it can be repealed, I understand very well that my revenue tax on imports must be almost a maximum tax. Now, I say that maximum tax is in many cases less than one-half the present tax.

Mr. Chairman, there are twelve articles at least in that tariff which are taxed over 100 per cent. They yield as much revenue as their original cost. There are more than twenty-five articles taxed over 75 per cent. They yield as much revenue nearly as their original cost. There are over one hundred and fifty articles in that tariff taxed over 50 per cent., and they yield two-thirds of their cost. I believe that the revenue maximum point is below either 50 or 80 or 100 per cent. But I say it is not difficult to ascertain that maximum revenue point. Why, sir, the Bureau of Statistics, if it chooses, could give us that information in twenty-four hours. In twenty-four hours they could send us here a list of articles now bearing duties of 100 or 80 or 50 per cent., and they could show us the revenue on each of those articles went on increasing up to a certain point that checked importation; and as the point was reached where importation was checked the revenue would decrease. The maximum would be ascertained as easily as the temperature is indicated by the thermometer, and we could take those articles, put the revenue duty on them, and we would nearly double the revenue of the country.

Those articles to which I have referred taxed over 50 per cent. yield a revenue, I think, of about $80,000,000, the value of the articles on which that amount of duty is levied being about $120,000,000. I may not give the figures quite accurately; but what I do know is that when the revenue point is reached on these articles the revenue from them would be increased $40,000,000; so that, for one, when I talk of revising the tariff I talk of reducing taxation and increasing revenue.

I have at my hand—and if I do not refer to them in detail it is because I want to conclude what I have to say in my time—I have at my hand the statistics of 1873, when there was 10 per cent. taken off the tariff. The tax was reduced 10 per cent. in 1873, and then it was put on again in 1875. We had two years with a reduction of 10 per cent., and what was the effect? Why, sir, the tax was reduced on six classes of manufactures about $10,000,000, and taxation was lightened $54,000,000; a reduction of revenue from salt, leather, iron, steel, woolens, and cottons of eight or nine millions lightened the cost of those articles consumed by the people fully $45,000,000, which is more than five times the amount surrendered by the Treasury.

That is why I stand here to-day advocating a revision of the tariff by Congress and not by the commission. But I have never had any difficulty about voting for the commission. Although I have entire respect for the opinion of other gentlemen, I have some for my own. I cannot be made to believe that that commission bill is going to give the protectionists the advantage in argument or to lose time in the revision. If we do not revise the tariff now, if we let this Congress pass, if we let this debate go by, if we let the vote on this bill go by without accomplishing anything, we will never as a Congress revise the tariff. We therefore lose no time with a commission.

As for the composition of the tariff commission, I do not care who the President puts upon it. I know he is bound to put on it a representative of the commercial interests of the country, a representative of the agricultural interests, and a representative of the manufacturing interests. I have no doubt he will do his duty. I am not going to assume, at all events, that he will not do his duty. But whether he does it or not, I do not care about their report. I am very sure if they reported from now until doomsday they would not be able to report more or better tariff literature than we have already had from the other side of the House, and from as able men as can ever go on that commission.

I am very sure that no man can be put on that commission as a revenue reformer who will do more justice to this question than has already been done by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] and as I have no doubt will be done before this debate closes by his Democratic colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means.

So far, therefore, as the tariff commission is concerned, and as electioneering pamphlets are concerned, it does not give me any concern. And I was going to say that I can vote for it just as easily as I can vote against it, and I can do either.

Mr. BLAND. I would ask if the gentleman believes the object of this tariff-commission bill means no reduction of the tariff before considering the internal-revenue question?

Mr. McLANE. I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLAND. My point is this: the idea is to postpone consideration of the tariff until we have considered the internal-revenue question, and reduce the internal revenue in order to increase the tariff.

Mr. McLANE. My honorable friend must pardon me. I have not the slightest idea that the design or the purpose of the other side of the House in pressing this bill is at all sinister or illegitimate.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman repeat his last statement? I did not exactly catch it.

Mr. McLANE. I said that I had not the slightest idea that the design or the purpose of the other side of the House in pressing this bill is at all illegitimate or improper. Does the gentleman understand me?

Mr. HAZELTON. He is satisfied. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLANE. More than that, and I must say it to my friends on the other side, I do not hold them responsible at all for that bill, whether it is a good bill or a bad bill. It is a bill devised by Hon. Mr. Eaton, a Democratic Senator from the State of Connecticut. I think it was not a very wise device on his part. I think he was looking a great deal more to the public sentiment of Connecticut than he was to the public sentiment of the whole country.

It is a fair subject on which gentlemen may differ. Some may think it will take the subject out of politics. When that bill was introduced two years ago, I owe it to frankness to say that I was perfectly ready to vote for it. I saw no harm in it. I did not give it much attention. I confess I was somewhat influenced by the political condition of the country. I thought it was an easy way to dispose of a question that could not then be brought to a conclusion.

I was then sitting in this House by the side of the predecessor, as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and was urging him from day to day, as his political friend and associate, to deal with this question of a revision of the tariff. I was urging upon him that his fame as a public man was involved in it; that he ought not to shrink from the full responsibility resting upon him. Day after day I urged him, and heard him say over and over again that it was impossible for him to get through this House or even through his committee any bill for the revision of the tariff.

I thought then as I think now that it was the duty of the House to do it. Discouraged by the House not doing it, I was willing—I never had occasion to say so then, but I say it to-day because it is in the line of my public duty to say it—I was willing to vote for it then. I was far more willing to vote for it then than I am to vote for it now.

And my friends on this side will make this distinction; while in the last Congress I would have been quite willing to have had a commission to revise the tariff when we had not power over legislation, although we had a majority in Congress, I now feel very differently. I now see a Republican House and a Republican President. The Republicans have control of the Government, and if they choose to do their duty they could revise the tariff.

And just at that point, catching the eye of my honorable friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] I will say I do not accept his apology, I do not accept his explanation, why the Committee on Ways and Means do not report a revision of the tariff. He says they are politicians. Ay, but politicians ought to be statesmen, and ought to know what should be done, and especially in the person of my honorable friend from Iowa. It does not rest with him properly to make such an excuse as that for the committee. He and they together have failed in their duty.

And that is why I do not want to vote for this bill now. I am perfectly willing to vote for it, however, if it will lead to a revision of the tariff. I am perfectly determined to vote for it if in my opinion it would lead to a revision of the tariff. No extravagance of opinion on either side of the House would deter me from voting for it. If I supposed that was my only hope for a revision of the tariff I would vote for it as cheerfully as the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, however I might differ with him as to how the tariff ought to be revised. And I shall vote for it if all other efforts to revise the tariff shall fail in this House.

Now, a word more and I shall not detain the committee longer. I have said that I was in favor of a repeal of the internal-revenue tax, and I do not want to qualify that in the least degree. I only want to make my statement harmonize with my argument. I do not want to repeal internal-revenue taxation nor the duties upon imports, if by so doing I destroy the revenue of the Government. My first obligation, in my judgment, is to maintain the credit of this Government absolutely. But it is not necessary to have the $100,000,000 or more of surplus that we have to-day.

Mr. KELLEY. One hundred and fifty million dollars this year.

Mr. McLANE. It is not necessary to have $100,000,000 of surplus, still less to have $150,000,000. The argument for me is a surplus of $100,000,000, because that was the surplus last year; and I do not mean to go into any speculation or guess-work. Having this surplus, I would make proper allowance for extraordinary charges upon the Treasury; and I regret to say there are extraordinary charges to be made upon the Treasury. There is an element of uncertainty growing out of the arrearages of pension act. The amount required under that act might be more than $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 or $70,000,000; indeed, without the most conscientious administration of the Pension Office, it will be. Therefore, respecting that indebtedness just as much as I respect any other, I would not repeal internal-revenue taxation beyond that point. Up to that point I would repeal internal-revenue taxation.

I would reduce largely our internal-revenue taxation. I would reduce the tax on whisky to 50 cents a gallon; and, by the way, I know no practical expert who believes that this reduction would diminish the revenue at all. It would reduce taxation, but it would not reduce revenue. I would take off one-half of the present tax on tobacco; and I think I could take off one-half the tax on malt liquors. These three reductions would come within the $100,000,000; they would amount to between $80,000,000 and $90,000,000. I am prepared to vote to-day for a proposition—indeed, I mean to move an amendment to this bill—providing that internal-revenue taxation shall be reduced somewhere within $100,000,000. I feel that we can go to that point, knowing that the consumption of the country is increasing daily with its population and that our revenue from imports will not fall off. Having accomplished this much, I would look forward, Mr. Chairman, to reducing within a reasonable time not only the tariff duties on imports, but to dispensing with the residue of our internal taxation.

If the Democracy of this country can harmonize upon all these great economic questions which has so divided them, which divide them still—if they can harmonize upon these great economic questions including the question of the currency, which embraces the question of the banks—if thus harmonizing we can take and hold this Government, I have no doubt at all that its expenses which are to-day $340,000,000 can be reduced well-nigh one-half. I have no doubt that is the true policy for the Democratic party. We should reduce our expenditures for the Army and Navy; we should maintain the public credit by paying off the national debt as rapidly as our revenue will permit.

Up to this time I have not said a word which implies that I desire to reduce the revenues beyond this surplus. I do not.

I would make any sacrifice rather than do that. If I am wrong in my opinion that we can reduce taxation and maintain revenue, I would then hold on to the revenue from internal taxation. I am basing my arguments upon a conviction that we can do both the one and the other. I have no doubt at all that the Committee on Ways and Means could bring us in to-day a bill in which there should be no taxation at greater rate than 50 per cent. One honorable gentleman, in his speech on this bill, indicated 40 per cent.; but he suggested that as a sort of horizontal rate, and it was connected with specific duties; and if I do not give it the concurrence of my judgment it is because of those two facts. I want no horizontal scheme of taxation; and I want no specific duty where an ad valorem duty can be successfully collected.

While I am speaking, Mr. Chairman, there comes to my mind the tariff of 1846. I want no better tariff, no better standard than that. It was a tariff constructed with infinite skill. Why, sir, the tariff of 1866, artistic as it is, fades away in comparison with the tariff of 1846. In that tariff honorable gentlemen would not find, I think, except upon liquors and one or two articles of luxury, any higher rate of duty than 40 per cent. The average rate was about 35 per cent. What was its effect upon the country? There was a greater increase of material wealth under the tariff of 1846 than has resulted from the tariff of 1866. We sometimes talk of our wonderful, our fabulous growth under the tariff of 1866. This idea has been presented to us over and over again from the other side of the House. Why, sir, we increased in material wealth, in the results of home industry more rapidly under the tariff of 1846 than we have done under the tariff of 1866.

I have before me the figures, and I can make good the assertion. I have called this tariff of 1866 an abominable tariff; I might call it a hybrid tariff, because as population and wealth increased revenue under this tariff does not proportionally increase, and in some years it has actually fallen off. In 1873 you modified the tariff by a reduction of 10 per cent., and in 1875 you restored the 10 per cent.; yet under the increase your revenues fell off. Nobody ever saw such a result as that from the tariff of 1846.

Now, we can all stand together, I believe, on the tariff of 1846, and for one that would be my counsel. I speak to my own political friends. Let us all stand together upon the principle of the tariff of 1846. Let us seek to ascertain the true revenue point, which, as I have said before, ought not to be difficult to ascertain. I am no expert any more than my honorable friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] but taking the Treasury returns for the last ten years upon the articles imported into this country, we can find the point from which the revenue begins to decrease; and that is the highest revenue point. The Committee on Ways and Means can in a week bring in a bill based upon the revenue principles of the tariff of 1846, and if they do not bring it in it is because my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is in a minority on that committee and cannot do impossible things.

But the other side of the House have the majority and they have the Government. They cannot only pass a law but they can get a law signed, provided it is not a law against Chinese immigration, and that they cannot get signed. But they can get a tariff signed; and it is their duty to have it signed.

And when we have that tariff law of 1846 opposed to them, to compare between that and any tariff they have ever established, or ever will give their sanction to, then we have an issue to go to the country upon. Then we will have no divisions in our ranks, and we will find it an easy thing to come to an understanding on all collateral questions. Those collateral questions gave us some embarrassment in the past, but they give us none at all at this time.

The eloquent gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] who preceded me in this debate—he and I might have differed in the early part of the Forty-sixth Congress on the currency question. I do not see how we can differ now, because he believed then that "greenbacks" were as good as gold. He never thought them better. Now I think they are better in certain respects. We have to-day no division of opinion as to silver, or gold, or greenbacks. We all recognize the obligation of the Government to pay the people or the creditor either the one or the other just as he prefers. If the "greenback" is not better it is far more convenient, and as long as it represents the bonds of the United States, worth 120 in the market, and a gold reserve, it would not be extravagent to say it was as good as gold.

Therefore I see no difficulty on that question. As for the other question which disturbed us so the other day, that question of fixing the day to consider the rechartering of the banks, it ought not to disturb us either. The banks have by existing law twenty years to live. That is nearly as long as the debt which they have to hold as security for their notes, and the only question which can become a practical question is, whether we will embarrass the banks in reorganizing or whether we will facilitate them. The national-banking system exists, and it will exist, whether we want it to exist or not. We have no responsibility for the system. It belonged to the war; it belongs to the debt. It must necessarily exist as long as the debt exists. Our political friends own bank stocks just as much as Republicans do. We all own it. I do not mean to measure out whether we have as much of it, but I have, for one, the same respect for the small stockholder as for the great, and I would make the same sacrifice of opinion to maintain the tranquillity and peace of the men who own but $100 or $1,000 of bank stock as of the men who own $6,000,000 of it, and I know those who own $6,000,000 of it.

For one, I shall vote to give the same consideration and same security to one as to the other. And I mean to say by that that I will give perfect consideration to both classes of bank stockholders during the twenty years the banks have the right to live, so that neither can lay at my door the reproach I did him injury. He shall live his whole twenty years in peace, as long and as often as the law permits.

I not only have no responsibility for such banking system, but I never will have. No Democrat on this floor will take on that question more radical position than I would. I would never vote for any bank connected with the Government. I never would give the Government any connection with the banking interests of the country. But what have I not submitted to as the result of that war that I should hesitate in supporting this banking system, which I must say in passing gives the people satisfaction and security? And my objection to it is not that it is not secure and safe, but it is that any connection between this Government and the banks is bad for the Government if not for the banks.

Therefore, for one, I would counsel we should let the banks live their natural life, giving them every facility to deal with the people, doing no man any wrong. If they have a right to reorganize let them reorganize. Let them live as long as the debt lives, but let us shorten the life of the debt. That is the policy I would recommend to the Democratic party. Shorten the life of the debt, maintain the public credit, leave unharmed all the material interests of the country, stand by a revenue tariff, eschew protection and eschew free trade.

Let schoolmen occupy themselves with that question; it is a beautiful topic, none more beautiful. Adam Smith is not unknown to the humblest, and no man who knows the first elements of finance can say a tax on imports is the most equal tax. Every man knows when he supports a tax on imports he supports a tax though not the most equal yet the most convenient that can be conceived of. The question of equality is sacrificed to the question of convenience, and that convenience is established by experience. We have had already the internal-revenue tax and a direct tax twice in this country, and every man knows the country was impatient to get rid of them at the earliest practicable moment.

We have had debts before, and every man in the country was impatient to get rid of the debt. I never knew a respectable public opinion in favor of retaining the debt that we might retain the banks; never, and I hope I never will. Therefore I conclude my words of counsel, not invoking any duress, not invoking any pressure. I do not say to any Democratic member on this floor, you shall think with me or stand outside; far from it. I have spent my life, and a long life, too, in close and intimate communion with the Democratic party of this country. I have had no occasion to wander away from it. I never knew a Democratic administration in this country which was not illustrated by some man who was at least an incidental protectionist.

We used to think Van Buren's administration was a sound administration, and we all thought James K. Polk's administration was sound. So it was, sound to the core; and yet James Buchanan, his Secretary of State—and Pennsylvania never will demand a more devoted champion to incidental protection, if not a protectionist per se, than he was—and yet we elected him President. Now that he is dead and gone and that I can honor him even more freely than I did while living, I wish to say that I do not know a sounder or more experienced statesman—intimately acquainted with all these economic questions, intimately allied with the theory of tariff.

But before Mr. Polk we had Van Buren——

Mr. COX, of New York. Pennsylvania gave Robert J. Walker.

Mr. McLANE. I think Mississippi did.

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir; born in Pennsylvania.

Mr. McLANE. Pardon me; born in Mississippi; educated in his youth in Pennsylvania. But he came to that administration from Mississippi as hot for a revenue tariff as any man who represents Mississippi to-day in either House of Congress. No; Robert J. Walker was a true representative of the Southwestern sentiment, and he not only gave a revenue system, but he gave that great empire of Texas, extending our borders to the Rio Grande. Van Buren gave us Mah lon Dickerson, of New Jersey, who in his day was as true and loyal to the Democratic party as any man who ever lived, and he was a protectionist per se. And George M. Dallas, who was the associate of Polk on the Presidential ticket in 1844, never in all of his life faltered in his support of incidental protection.

No, Mr. Chairman, if I may drop the parliamentary tone in its reference to my political associates on this floor, I would appeal to them not to separate or differ on these economic questions. I, for one, do not care—I speak with warmth because I love the associations—I only care for the perpetuity of the party with which I have been so long associated; I am prompted by affection. It has done for me all that I could have wished done. All the pride I have had in politics that party gave to me. Though I am not three score and ten, I hope I may give my counsel; but it is more in the way of legitimate argument on this question that I address it than as counsel. I am responsive, responsive absolutely to honorable gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject. I understand their views and wishes. I am responsive to them, and we must stand together on this question. We must stand, or we will not prevail in this House or in the country. As I said before, I will vote with you against or for the bill; and I will vote with you for every amendment that rallies this House to the principles of the tariff of 1846, and on those principles we can safely go to the country on this bill. I have no doubt at all that we will have the support of the best sentiment of the country.

I have in my hand here the resolutions of 1876—there are none better—modified in style a little in 1880, but modified in style only to confuse it. It stands out in the resolution of 1876 as clearly as the sunlight, a tariff for revenue, and only for revenue. It does not say a tariff for revenue only, but a tariff only for revenue, a return absolutely and unqualifiedly to the principles of 1846—against the present system in all its purposes. With that crest on its banner and perfect harmony upon all these incidental questions we will prevail. Let the war alone; let the war measures alone; let the war debt alone.

Our business is to maintain the credit of the country; and I say, Mr. Chairman, and I know it, and every philosophical statesman on this floor and in this country knows it, that no party will receive the support of this country, or deserve it, that does not command the confidence of the people—none. They must have confidence in your wisdom as well as in your integrity. You must be statesmen as well as politicians; and as I said to the honorable gentleman from Iowa, politicians ought to be statesmen and are statesmen, and when they are not statesmen they do not deserve to be called politicians. It was a most unfortunate expression for that honorable gentleman, because the country at least receive it as embracing himself as well as ourselves; a reproach not intended as a reproach, but still in expression a reproach. It discredits us and we must further discredit ourselves when we fail to do this work.

I had intended to connect with this subject one other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. REED took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 97) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Acting Assistant Paymaster Edward K. Winship, United States Navy;

A bill (S. No. 648) for the relief of William G. Ford, administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased; and

A bill (S. No. 1013) for the erection of a light-house at or near Point Patterson, on the northern shore of Lake Michigan.

TARIFF-COMMISSION.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the bill under consideration is to continue the present tariff. As a people we have made great progress, but we have grown faster in nothing than in the use of the taxing power. When the First Congress assembled the country was grievously burdened with the debt of the war for Independence, then but six years past. No system of taxation had been provided. To raise a national revenue duties and taxes were laid on imported goods. Duties now 35 to 75 were then but 5 and 7½ per cent. These low rates were fixed after considering the question of "encouragement and protection of manufactures," then said to be in their infancy.

Seventeen years from our own civil war the country, still indebted, is burdened with a system of war taxation yielding a surplus. The Forty-seventh Congress stays and avoids its duty. Professedly it waits for nine men wiser than itself to consider if temporary war taxes, excessive and unnecessary for revenue, are not essential for the encouragement and protection of manufactures.

In the ninety or more intervening years from the First to the Forty-seventh Congress more than ninety tariff bills were considered, some increasing others reducing duties and taxes, all resulting in the same conflict of opinion and purpose.

The honorable chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, (Mr. KELLEY,) in the International Review, says the advocates of the protective policy "have recognized the fact that national and individual life is not governed by a system of equations, but influenced by cupidity, ambition, and all human emotions and passions."

Mr. Chairman, only a national life so influenced can render the tribute which individual life impelled by like motives may demand. When our national and individual life shall be less influenced by cupidity we will have less of the protective policy. By exchanging part of our abundant harvests for goods made by those our high-tariff men designate as "foreign paupers," we sell them what we do not want to eat, and buy of them what we need to wear. Each may work for his own interest, while we serve each other. We recognize that better law of doing unto others as you would have them do unto you.

This commission we are assured is not for delay, but to systematize and give stability to our customs laws—a duty enjoined upon this House which the advocates of this scheme assert the House is unfitted to perform. Whatever may be said of the plan itself, the apology for it is new. Those who make it were in control of the House, where all revenue measures must originate, sixteen successive years ending March 3, 1875, and the laws enacted by them to increase duties outnumber the years of their continuous control. The first, the Morrill tariff, passed before the war, its author said gave adequate protection to all industries, but it was speedily increased 50 per cent., with the semblance of justification. It was supplemented with temporary war duties under the alleged necessity for revenue. The war with its temporary necessities has long since passed, but the temporary duties remain. An import duty was laid on raw cotton, in consideration for which cotton manufacturers asked and were given a compensating additional duty on cotton goods. The duty on cotton was repealed, and the cotton manufacturer with free raw material holds fast to his increased duty. In the hour of the country's severest trial an income tax and a tax on domestic manufactures was imposed, in compensation for which the duty was increased on all imported manufactures. The income-tax and tax on domestic manufactures were removed, and now, after thirteen years, those who have so long profited and continue to profit by advantages obtained under such circumstances refuse to surrender them. In any forum, or before any tribunal not dominated by the protective policy, longer retention of duties so imposed would be condemned as a breach of public faith. Here the authors of a scheme to continue these duties and exactions claim for themselves superior statesmanship.

In 1872 a 10 per cent. reduction in the duties on manufactured goods was made. Three years later, in March, 1875, the advocates for more protection were yet in control of Congress and all departments of the Government, but a Democratic majority had been chosen to the next House. There was general business depression, with labor unemployed and a deficit in the Treasury. The earnings of the people and their ability to pay taxes were greatly reduced. Public expenditures had to be largely diminished or taxes increased. Those who claim to be the especial friends of labor whenever the opportunity offers for increased tariff taxes had no difficulty in determining to lay them on; others had already been imposed during the session, and then in its closing hours the professed friends of labor reimposed the 10 per cent. duty, largely increased the cost of manufactured goods, and at the end of two years the revenue from customs had fallen twenty-seven millions.

TARIFF PROTECTION.

Taxes by duties, excises, or in whatever form laid, are rightly laid and collected to pay the public debt and the expenses of good government. The encouragement or protection which manufactures and all other industries receive from taxation they rightly receive as the result of taxes so laid and collected. And the encouragement or protection thus afforded is ample for the prosperity of all our industries and will best provide for the general welfare of the United States. So it was substantially declared at Saint Louis in 1876, and Cincinnati in 1880, simply this: that our tariff policy must be governed more by a system of equations and influenced less by cupidity.

When the Morrill tariff of 1861 was considered Senator SHERMAN, then a member of the House, said:

I vote for the Senate amendments, and have voted for this bill as a revenue measure simply.

Mr. MORRILL said:

The principles upon which the bill is founded do not necessarily raise the question of protection. * * * The highest duties fixed upon have been so fixed more with a view to revenue than protection, and would place our people on a level of fair competition with the rest of the world.

It would place them on this level, because under the revenue tariffs of 1846, 1857, and former tariffs, Mr. MORRILL said:

We have made more rapid strides in cheapening manufactures and therefore lessening the necessity for incidental protection than ever England herself made in any equal period of time.

Mr. Chairman, the duties fixed by the Morrill tariff have been increased and supplemented with others double in form and double in rate; twenty years have been added in the process of cheapening manufactures, and therefore lessening the necessity for "incidental protection." The friends of tariff reform now demand such reduction as will still leave the average rates as high as those fixed by the Morrill tariff. What answer is made to this most reasonable demand? The answer is that we are revolutionists; that we would at once destroy the manufacturing interests of the country and undo the policy of its earlier and better statesmanship. The answer is a shallow pretense, which can deceive no one.

TARIFFS OF OUR FIRST STATESMEN.

The earlier statesmen of the country were not all of one opinion as to the best methods for diversifying its industry and increasing the productive power of its people. Impelled by patriotic duty to provide a national revenue, something was often yielded by them to that protective selfishness which since then has obtained so much. But that they gave assent and support to the protective policy as now advocated and practiced is mere assertion, and finds no justification in history, and none in fact. Those who shaped our institutions and made them republican in form were scarcely less mindful of the injustice and oppression of trade restrictions than of restraints on their liberties. In the first Congressional debate Mr. Madison said:

I am myself the friend of a very free system of commerce, and hold it as a truth that commercial shackles are generally unjust, oppressive, and impolitic. * * * All are benefited by exchange, and the less the exchange is cramped by government the greater are the proportions of benefit to each. The same argument holds good between nation and nation, and between parts of the same nation.

In his first message Mr. Jefferson said:

Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, the four pillars of our prosperity, are the most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise. Protection from casual embarrassments, however, may sometimes be reasonably interposed.

In his last annual message President Monroe said:

The principles upon which the commercial policy of the United States is founded are to be traced to an early period. This policy was free and equal reciprocity. That principle has pervaded all the acts of Congress and all negotiations of the Executive on the subject.

And such, Mr. Chairman, were the views of General Jackson, Mr. Benton, and at one time of Mr. Webster.

The tariff convention of 1831, assembled in New York, was quite as able and at least as honest in the expression of its purposes as similar conventions of more recent date. That convention said of the men who formed the Government that "they offered free trade to all nations; but the nations with one accord rejected it."

That convention conceded that all our laws up to that time restricting commerce were no part of an original policy, but countervailing measures to compensate for regulations and restrictions on our ships and products by nations which had rejected our offers of free commerce.

Now, sir, other nations have made some advance toward that freedom of commerce and exchange to which our first statesmen invited all nations a century ago. We stay a century behind and are asked to retreat.

To show how the right to exchange products was valued in the early history of the country, I need do no more than point to the sacrifices made to secure it. To secure this New England voted in the convention which framed the Constitution that persons might be imported for twenty years and sold into slavery. And yet such was the hatred of New England for slavery that before another twenty years expired she began to hedge it about with a view to its ultimate extinction. Later on, to secure a profitable foreign traffic, she insisted upon a low revenue tariff only on Jamaica molasses as a raw material for making rum, and this, too, with an aversion to intemperance equal to her hatred of slavery. There is much in history which justifies the belief that rum was exchanged for the persons sold into slavery.

Mr. Clay, the credited father of the American system, was the author of a bill as late as 1833, approved by General Jackson, reducing the highest duties to 20 per cent. The professed adherents of Mr. Clay's policy in this House will not permit a vote on a bill to reduce duties to 50 per cent. If the proposed commission reports a bill in which the highest duties do not more than double Mr. Clay's, it will find its Congressional cemetery in the Ways and Means Committee, and never receive the consideration of this House. As late as 1842 Mr. Clay said:

I am not advocating the revival of a high protective tariff. I am for giving the country a revenue which may provide for the economical wants of the Government and at the same time give an incidental protection.

Thus it will be seen that this great tariff leader made revenue the paramount object of a tariff.

Mr. Hamilton is called in this debate "after Burke the profoundest statesman of his age." His arguments favoring the protection of manufactures, it is said, were and remain unanswerable. Most of the duties proposed by Mr. Hamilton were below revenue-tariff rates, many times less than the present rates. These he proposed to supplement with bounties to be paid from the public Treasury. He knew what protection meant, and offered it in the simplest form. He knew it meant then what it means now—bounty to the manufacturer. His methods and most of his arguments have gone into disuse. His professed followers look in vain to anything he said or did in support of the argument which is to-day their chief reliance. He never advocated protection as a means of increasing the wages of labor. That is an invention not in use in his time. Whatever erroneous views he entertained he practiced no indirection to make them acceptable to others.

The form of government proposed by Mr. Hamilton was not adopted, and is not the one under which we live. He said in the convention to form the Constitution:

All communities divide themselves into the few and the many; * * * the rich and well-born, * * * and the mass of the people. The people are turbulent and changing; they seldom judge or determine right. Give, therefore, the first class—the rich and well-born—a distinct, permanent share in the Government. They will check the unsteadiness of the second—the mass of the people—and * * * will ever maintain good government. Nothing but a permanent body can check the imprudence of democracy.

Thus it will be seen that, great as Mr. Hamilton was, he believed none but the few he called the rich and well-born capable of governing and maintaining good government. His form of government was rejected, but are we not drifting to its substance? How else are we to account for the growing popularity of his opinions? No one knew better than he that laboring-men are never legislated into his governing class, and that men do not attain riches from the labor of their own hands, but from the profits of the labor of other men. The hardship of this truth is not helped but aggravated by tariffs and by any and every system professedly in the interest of any class. The real friends of labor never attempt such legislation but from mistaken views. In every race for legislative benefits labor obtains less, capital more than its share. Individual enterprise and the legitimate accumulation of capital cannot be interfered with, but legislation which helps an unjust distribution of property or an unfair division of the proceeds of labor is a great public wrong. Aside from land, the value of which depends upon the use made of it, all the capital or the savings of labor in the richest State never exceeds three years' consumption, and as to food we are always nearer than a year to starvation. The earnings of both capital and labor must be paid from their joint product. When capital takes too much, labor receives too little. Official statistics show that under this system in many industries capital takes to itself four times the earnings of its ordinary employment, the rates of interest, and leaves to labor less than its legitimate earnings. (Appendix 1.)

If Mr. Hamilton desired to foster and perpetuate divisions in society and the fortunes of men, the protective policy was wisely selected for the purpose. That I do not misjudge the effect, if not the purpose, of the system now so strenuously insisted upon, attention is called to the argument upon which it is supported where laboring-men have no votes:

Sir Leonard Tilley, the Canadian minister of finance, argues that it is an excellent feature of the new tariff policy in the Dominion; that it helps a few men to build up colossal fortunes, for those enjoying them will be sure to expend a large percentage of their incoming millions in various forms of luxury which will give employment to many.

How, sir, will the Canadian minister's high tariff help a few men to build up colossal fortunes to spend in luxury and to employ many unless these few take more than they give back? If a few take more from than they return to the many by means of a protective tariff, whom does it protect and benefit? These questions the nine wise men of the tariff commission will never answer.

ENGLAND'S POLICY—EMIGRATION.

With the apparent purpose of prejudicing a fair consideration of this subject our opponents reproduce the crimes of England against the trade of other nations when her policy was protective and identical with ours, differing only in methods and the selection of its victims. England's protective policy led her into distant seas, where she despoiled all countries for her own. Protective America is not itinerant. Her favorites prey upon her own children. Nor is it true as asserted that the friends of tariff reform either borrow or copy the policy of England. When she placed high tariffs and other restrictions on commerce Patrick Henry was pleading for commerce free as air; Jefferson and Madison were offering free trade to all the world, and this a half century before England adopted her present policy. The present system had advocates, but no footing until it obtained it incidentally to the necessities of war in 1816. To the extent it is a fixed policy it became so from the alleged necessities for revenue in the late war, the good faith of which allegation may now well be questioned.

The crimes of England against the rights and liberties of the Irish people are summoned to the support of fetters on the liberty of trade and the freedom of commerce. But these crimes began and were even greater when England was protected as we are now. Under her present commercial policy Ireland's condition, grievous and deplorable as it still remains, was made for a time at least better than it had long been. It is not the commercial policy of England which she adopted only in 1846, but her landed policy or system of land tenures centuries old which has desolated Ireland's homes and oppressed her people.

The facts concerning emigration, especially from Ireland, are first perverted, then called to the aid of the present tariff, which is said to encourage emigration. The year 1857, in fact, the period from 1846 to 1860, has been styled "the Democratic free-trade era," during which the low tariff, it is asserted, repelled emigration from our hospitable shores. The average annual emigration was larger from 1846 to 1860 than from 1861 to 1880. It was one hundred thousand more, chiefly from Ireland, in 1857 than in 1877; larger in 1857, 1858, and 1859 than in 1877, 1878, and 1879. That more emigrants came in 1880 than in the three previous years, under the same tariff, would convince any one but protectionists that emigration was influenced by causes not dependent upon rates of duty, but reasons that address themselves to the higher aspirations of men. To believe that emigration is induced alone by the possibility of pecuniary gain, is to believe that the people from whom we are descended have no remaining aspirations akin to those we inherited from them; aspirations which peopled this New World and gave it a place among the nations of the earth. This protective policy seems to understand no law but that which addresses itself to the lower appetites of men. Since the adoption of the German tariff emigration from that country has largely increased. Germans could find in Mexico a country abounding in resources with a tariff double our own, but they prefer a home here with a kindred people and freer institutions.

REVENUE TARIFF, 1846-1860.

In 1857 the revenue was excessive and the tariff was reduced. Financial depression came in that year and the revenues fell short of the average ordinary expenditure of the four previous years. And so under the present tariff, with financial depression in 1877 and 1878, the revenues fell below the average expenditure of the four previous years, exclusive of all payments on account of the public debt and pensions. Protectionists will never cease explaining how low tariff was the cause of the financial embarrassment in 1857 to 1859, and how the high tariff was not the cause of that from 1873 to 1878. Neither nations nor men are in great danger of financial distress for want of being taxed, and exactly how low taxes and low duties brought financial embarrassment to both in the Democratic revenue tariff era ending in 1860 has never been satisfactorily explained. The most plausible theory would seem to be one advanced in this debate that under a low tariff our markets are made a dumping-ground for England's surplus and our people buy themselves poor. This is good enough for theory but has no fact to support it. In 1860 and previous years the importations were 15 per cent. (to the person) less than in 1880. This dumping-ground argument is a fallacy, but then it is as true as any other used for the same purpose.

In the conditions following the war, and which were probably inevitable, our bonds went abroad, prices were inflated, importations were large. We went above our financial level and came down in the crash of 1873. Having a country of endless resources and a people of matchless industrial energy and skill, we recovered in six years, in 1879. With less tariff and less taxes we could have recovered sooner. It may be stated upon the authority of the honorable chairman [Mr. KELLEY] that half the decade from 1870 to 1880 was a time of universal depression and despondency, when failure upon failure of the most experienced iron-masters was announced from day to day, with wages so low that workers in iron and their families could scarcely escape destitution and starvation, and yet history will correctly transmit that as an era of substantial and wonderful national progress.

The condition of the country from 1873 to 1879 was much the same as 1857 to 1859. Banking with no money to bank on and the discovery and mining of gold were followed by increased prices and large importations, resulting in the same financial condition in 1857 which followed 1873. The mischief was done in the former period, before the reduction of the tariff in 1857, as it was in the later period before 1873—the effect came afterward. Congress could have done in 1857 as the gentleman from Iowa and the honorable chairman did in 1875—increased the tariff in the interest of their already protected friends with loss of revenue to the Government and increased cost of living to the people. In 1857 Congress waited for that recovery which was sure to come, and did come in 1860. In growth of population, in the increase of wealth and in the wages of labor, in the abundance of harvests, in the industry, contentment, and happiness of the people, in all that attends the progress of a great country, the period from 1850 to 1860 may challenge comparison with any period in the history of this or any other country. These are enduring facts not to be changed by the want of candor to admit them.

California, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico, and part of Colorado are but one of the rich treasures of the so-styled "Democratic era of free trade." Without its statesmanship their untold wealth of mine and field would be the product of a neighboring nation, with your impossible wall of protective duties forbidding its exchange for our high-priced goods. Their annual yield of gold and silver far exceeds the wages of all our workers in iron and steel. Colorado's population added to those now in manufacturing industries would make all the goods the country can consume. In fact, it is now said by intelligent iron-masters that the iron and steel industry can supply the demand of the whole country; and the same is true of cotton and woolen industries; and which way shall we now lay our course?

PROTECTION AT HOME MEANS EXCLUSION ABROAD.

Protesting, but four years ago, against modification of the tariff as it exists to-day, the honorable chairman [Judge KELLEY] said:

> The loom and the spindle stand still. * * * The fires are out in the forge, the captains of industry by thousands are passing into bankruptcy, and the laboring people into want, if not into absolute pauperism.

Now himself and associates insist this tariff must be maintained to prevent the fires going out in the forge and to save the laboring people from want. This they assert will be the result to the iron industry in Ohio and throughout the country unless this tariff is continued "to protect labor."

In the Hocking Valley, the chief iron region of Ohio, iron is produced for $12 per ton. My colleague on the committee, Mr. CARLISLE, has already shown by the census report that the total amount paid for wages to make a ton of iron, including that paid for mining the ore, was less than $8. Iron cannot be carried from the furnace to and across the sea and from the sea to Ohio for $8, and this sum, which exceeds all the wages paid in making iron in Ohio, the importer must pay if he pays no revenue duty before he comes in competition with Ohio iron. Hence it will be seen that it is not labor protectionists would protect. Manufacturers diversify industry and greatly augment its productive power, but the argument on which the necessity for protection is based makes them helpless infants always. If iron cannot be manufactured at a profit in Ohio with a protecting sea giving it $8 over its competitors without any protecting duty, it cannot be sold at a profit in a foreign market to reach which it must pay $8. The cost of importation is always so considerable as to give our own manufacturers greatly the advantage in our own markets, aside from the additional advantage necessarily resulting from a revenue tariff. And whatever cannot be sold with profit in our own markets without a duty, either for revenue or protection, cannot be profitably sold in any other country. If we must protect our manufactures against foreign competition in our own markets, they are forever excluded from foreign markets where they are unprotected.

If this be true, then, with all our superior intelligence and skill, with our gain from fertile soil, genial climate, iron and coal all over the land and nearly on the surface, this 50,000,000 of people cannot contribute one piece of handiwork to the wants of their fellow-men in any country but their own, and here we must have a tariff to prevent our being supplied cheaper than we can supply ourselves.

REVENUE DUTY EXCEEDS WAGES.

With what sincerity can it be said that the manufacturing industries of the country will be either destroyed or injuriously affected if the present tariff is not maintained, and especially if it is reduced to a revenue basis. To pay the war debt, including pensions, will require $4,000,000,000, and the ordinary expenditures are and will continue to be greater in proportion to population than in the revenue-tariff period. Looking to the opportunity these vast sums afford for gathering taxes if for revenue only, why should protectionists refuse to be comforted? They admit in this debate for the first time that in all else but the cost of labor we can manufacture and compete with all the world, but still insist that we must protect to compensate for the difference in the wages of labor.

Under the revenue tariff of 1846 the duty on iron was 30 per cent. The tariff of 1857, for which Stephen A. Douglas, Charles Sumner, and Henry Wilson voted, reduced it to 24 per cent. This tariff and the Morrill tariff of 1861 were approved by Mr. Buchanan, a protectionist, and it is this 24 per cent. tariff which is always produced as a witness that a revenue tariff will destroy the iron industry in Ohio and throughout the country. Yet it appears in the census statement (1) that the total wages paid for labor in iron and steel mills and factories was less than 19 per cent., or $19 for every $100 worth of iron and steel made; under a 24 per cent. tariff the importer must pay $24 to import iron valued at $100, or $5 more than all the wages paid to produce the home-made iron. The total wages paid in all our iron mines and works in the census year was $65,000,000; the product was 4,000,000 tons. The freight on a like quantity from the works in Great Britain to the sea, thence to the United States, thence to the center of population, is at least $8 per ton, or $32,000,000. Suppose rates of wages in Great Britain are but half the rates here, this cost in freight alone compensates for the difference.

The value of our whole iron and steel product in the census year was $296,557,685. Suppose a 24 per cent. revenue tariff, as low as that of 1857, when we had no war debt or pension list, was adopted. The 24 per cent. duty to be paid to import what we make would be $71,000,000. That is to say, the importer under a 24 per cent. duty, before he comes into competition with our iron and steel, must pay $71,000,000 or $6,000,000 more than all the wages paid for the whole iron and steel product in the United States. The people who consumed the iron and steel product of 1880 could have imported it, paid all the wages paid in iron works and mines, and saved $6,000,000, while the workers would have been left free to follow other pursuits.

Two years ago the manufacturers appeared before the committee to resist any reduction of the twenty-eight-dollar duty on steel rails. One of the ablest of them, Mr. Wharton, who never understates anything which will help his interests, stated that the difference in the cost of making steel rails in this country and in England does not exceed 25 per cent. When it was proposed to fix the duty at $15 per ton, which was at least 50 per cent. on the foreign cost, it was resisted by Mr. Wharton, by the American Iron and Steel Association, and by the friends of protection here and everywhere as an effort to destroy our industries. The bill introduced by me in the Forty-fourth Congress reduced duties on cotton goods to the average rate of 30 per cent. That was called a tariff for revenue only, and those who seek to continue the present tariff opposed it under the pretense that it did not sufficiently protect labor and would destroy the cotton industry. The census shows that all the wages paid in cotton-mills in 1880 were less than 23 per cent., or less than $23 for every $100 of cotton goods made. Raw cotton is the article of chief value in cotton goods; in all the heavier and coarser goods it is more than half the value, but not near so much on finer and lighter goods.

The foreign manufacturer buys our cotton, two-thirds of all we grow, carries it to and over the sea, to the mill and back again to our people when made into cloth, and pays, under a 30 per cent. duty, $30 for every $100 worth of cloth returned. And this we are asked to believe would destroy our cotton industries. Not only does the foreign manufacturer come to us for cotton but he must go to Iowa, the center of the grain-growing and provision-producing region, a thousand miles from the sea, for food. While the chosen representatives of cotton industries were here protesting against a reduction of duties, asserting that the present high tariff must be continued to protect them or they would be crushed out and perish in our own markets, our cotton goods were selling unprotected in foreign markets in free competition with the rest of the world. Last year cotton goods of our make sold in China valued at $3,600,000.

In view of these facts the oft-repeated assertions that a reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis will destroy or injuriously affect the cotton industry is too absurd for belief even by those who make them. A reduction of the tariff to a revenue basis will benefit the manufacturer to the extent it cheapens the cost of material and production, and benefit the laborer to the extent it cheapens the cost of the necessaries and comforts of life, while the importer must still pay more in duty on imported goods than the manufacturer pays for wages in making domestic goods. It will increase rather than diminish the wages of labor by extending and multiplying markets for the products of labor. As well manacle men for self-defense as to circumscribe markets for the products of labor to increase wages.

TARIFF COMMISSION—ITS ORIGIN AND PURPOSE.

Just before the last Presidential election an attempt was made to reduce duties, which was resisted, as every effort in the same direction has been resisted by the friends of this tariff-commission scheme. The late President, General Garfield, insisted the bill then proposed violated two principles recognized in our tariff legislation, and in the report of the minority, said:

> The undersigned are not opposed to a general revision of the tariff, or to a reduction of rates, whenever this can be done in harmony with the principles herein set forth.

This declaration went to the people as a campaign document over the signature of the late President. His friends propose to keep his pledge that he was not opposed to a general revision of the tariff or a reduction of rates by the appointment of a commission, as the bill provides, to consider the tariff "upon a scale of justice to all interests." Such a commission would be representative and familiar with the conditions of each, and each would be represented in proportion to its magnitude. Such a commission might revise the tariff with justice to all interests, but would greatly disappoint those who first fell upon this scheme to revise a tariff they seek to perpetuate. In March, 1879, shortly before the Eaton bill was presented, Mr. D. J. Morrell, of Pennsylvania, was made president of the American Iron and Steel Association. On taking the chair he advised the association to—

> Demand that the subject shall be intrusted to a commission not of owl-eyed college professors, but of business men and statesmen appointed by the President of the United States, with instructions and authority to ascertain the condition and wants of all our industries, and to examine the tariff legislation of this and other countries with reference to its influence upon national welfare, and demand also that Congress shall refrain from legislation upon the subject until the presentation of the report of this commission. If no other good results from this, we shall at least have what the country most needs, a little rest.

Protection fears college professors. What, sir, must be thought of an assumed governmental policy which dreads the scholarship of the nineteenth century?

Mr. Morrell was a member of this House when the tariff on steel rails was raised to $28 per ton. He is largely interested in iron and steel works and has resisted every effort to revise and reduce the tariff. His plan contemplates no delay, but "what the country most needs, a little rest" only.

What its advocates here expect from his commission is fairly inferred from the McKinley bill, adopted by the majority of the committee and given to the press in advance of the adoption of this bill to accomplish a like purpose. That bill reduces no duty, but increases duties now 30, 35, and 45 per cent. to 75, 125, and 200 per cent. Of the duties so to be increased, are those on iron for hoops used in baling hay and for cotton-ties, rods for wire fence and binders, steel in some forms, and some manufactures of steel and other articles of iron and steel unnumbered and undescribed essential for use in the various arts of life by mechanics, farmers, builders, and in the production of other manufactures. The annual cotton product already pays a duty of $500,000 on imported cotton-ties, and this increase of duty adds an additional $500,000 to be paid on the ties when imported.

Mr. Sherman, an intelligent and reliable manufacturer of wire fence at Chicago, in a statement to the committee fixed the increased cost of wire fence at $3,000,000 per annum as the result of this bill, and said that he and other manufacturers already pay $15 per ton royalty to the owner of the wire-fence patent which is added to the cost.

PROTECTIVE DUTIES.

I will append statements (2) taken from the census and Bureau of Statistics reports for 1880, which show that the existing tariff places our manufactures above the level of fair competition and how the prices to be paid by the consumer for domestic and imported goods are increased as the result of high protective duties.

For that year the import of sugar and molasses amounted to $77,052,639, and the duty paid to the Treasury was $42,203,915, the average duty on sugar 59 per cent. and 35 per cent. on molasses. That this duty was added to and made part of the price paid by the people is not questioned.

The quantity of sugar and molasses produced in this country was less than one-seventh of the quantity imported. But for the tariff it could have been imported for $11,103,466, and cost of importation with freight added. Commercial rates establish the fact that it was sold for more than $16,719,970, a price equal to the value of the foreign article with duty added—that the price to the consumer was increased $5,616,504, which was a bounty to the planters. The whole increase in cost to the consumer resulting from the tariff, which on sugar and molasses is largely a revenue tariff, was $48,820,418, which was so divided that the Treasury received $7.51 of revenue while the planter received $1 of bounty.

The requirements of the Government neither demand nor justify the collection of such a tax on sugar, an article so generally used by all classes. The duty ought to be largely reduced, but it would be little less than a crime to reduce this duty, which gives the Treasury $7 to $1 in bounty, while we retain duties which give $7 in bounty and but $1 to the Treasury.

The duty on hoop-iron was $31.66 per ton. The price of the domestic article was $14.61 more than the price of the foreign article, including cost of importation, which was an increase equal to half the duty. The Treasury received $500,986, and the manufacturer $1,414,876, or $2.82 for $1 to the Treasury. On bar-iron the average duty was $22.66 per ton; the value and price of the home product was $7.40 in excess of the cost of the imported article, including cost of importation, an increase equal to but one-third of the duty, and the manufacturer received $4,907,761 bounty; the Government, $1,641,453 in duty—$3 to manufacturer, $1 to the Government. Iron rails pay $16.68 duty. The increased cost over the foreign article was $11.33, or two-thirds of the duty. The cost of iron rails was increased by the tariff $6,114,916, of which $5,290,119 went to the manufacturer, and $824,747 to the Treasury; $6.41 for bounty to $1 for revenue.

The value of steel rails was $50.48 or $16.85 per ton more at our mills than the cost of imported rails, an increase equal to two-thirds of the duty, $28 per ton. The tariff increase of the price for rails used that year was $1,478,659 of revenue to the Government and $12,497,157 to the manufacturers, who received $8.45 while the Treasury received $1. In this statement the values of domestic products given in the census returns are accepted as true. The price of steel rails is stated at $50.48 per ton, which is $15 or 30 per cent. below the price for that year. It is an undisputed fact that the market price was $65, and therefore the increase in prices resulting from the tariff, as given from the official report, appears less than the actual increase. An examination of the officially reported prices of other articles, where their description and classification afford means of comparison, shows the same undervaluation as in steel rails, and to the extent of this undervaluation the increase in prices resulting from the tariff is made to appear less. It was doubtless with a view to official statements like these the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] said of Mr. Swank, an officer of the Census Bureau, employé and representative of the iron and steel associations, that "his report is doubtless as favorable to their interest as he could honestly make it." It is but just to say that Mr. Swank may have to rely upon the values reported to him and for the entire accuracy of which he is not responsible.

Accepting as correct the census statements of prices and values it is not always true that the price of the domestic article is increased to the extent of the rate of duty on the foreign article. In fact it is true that a duty may be levied without affecting the price of the home article. This often results from active competition among our own people and from causes entering into the cost of production and by which we can produce them cheaper than they can be produced elsewhere. This is true of coarser cotton goods and many articles of comparative cheap production. It is true of cotton and nearly or quite all agricultural products. The rule is the other way and it is not always a matter easy to determine the actual increase in the cost and price of articles of domestic manufacture resulting from the duty on imported articles.

Professor Perry of Williams College, where the late President Garfield was educated, estimates that the tariff has so increased prices as to cost the people since 1861 $600,000,000 per annum. On the basis of this estimate the tariff has yielded $4 in bounty to the manufacturers while bringing $1 into the Treasury. Mr. Walker, author of the tariff of 1846, estimated that the present tariff gave $1 to the Treasury with $2.33 to the manufacturers, yielding them $350,000,000 per annum in excess of the price for which the goods could be imported at the time, and so much I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] substantially concedes. The census statements given present the enormity of the system and its oppressive results.

Railroads are now being built through Texas into Mexico, and the Mexican Government is encouraging that industry by admitting rails and materials free. It is within my own knowledge that a locomo-ave of foreign make costs the builders of these roads $3,000 less than one of our make; and that steel rails cost them $25 less per ton when imported than when purchased here. The result is that the same company builds and equips its road for 25 per cent. less in Mexico than in Texas with the same cost for labor. Estimating the cost of building and equipping a railroad at $20,000 per mile, 25 per cent. or $5,000 per mile of this cost results from the tariff. We have built 65,000 miles under this tariff, which has added $5,000 per mile or $325,000,000 to the cost of roads built since it was enacted. Railroads must be renewed once in twelve years. That is, the cost of keeping them up for twelve years is equal to the first cost. We have now 102,000 miles of railroad, and the annual cost of maintaining them equals the cost of building 8,000 miles, from which it appears that this tariff increases the cost of keeping up railroads $40,000,000 per annum. All these additional millions of money which this system contributed to the original cost of railroads, and to the cost of keeping them up, was and will continue to be paid from the product of labor. I know it is said that railroads are monopolies, whose prices are not influenced by the cost of building them, but wholly regulated by competition. To the same extent, and in the sense that railroads are monopolies, manufactories are monopolies. But, sir, competition itself is dependent on its cost. Competition which does not yield profit is short-lived. No system yet devised for regulating railroads has ignored the question of their cost, the cost of their construction and maintenance; the people pay both and a profit on both.

High tariff has reduced prices, say its advocates, who support the assertion by a comparison of present prices with the prices in 1865 when the difference in currency would account for a difference of one-third in prices. Statements carefully compiled by Mr. Burchard, Director of the Mint, and Mr. Spofford, Librarian, show agricultural products lower and most manufactures higher in 1880 than in 1860, though the difference is not important. The average price of wheat from 1850 to 1860 was $1.38 per bushel; from 1870 to 1880 it was $1.25. From 1850 to 1860 the average price of corn was 71 cents; it was 61 cents from 1870 to 1880. These prices are taken from the prices of exports of the Bureau of Statistics. Cotton and woolen goods are lower than in 1860, but not nearly so low as compared with prices in foreign markets, or as compared with the improved means and reduced cost of production in this and other countries.

The real question is, What does protection cost the consumer? How much does it increase the price he pays for the necessaries and comforts of life at the time he buys them? Not what they might have cost ten or any number of years ago. What is the difference in cost in our market and cost in foreign market with the cost of importation added? I have already shown from official reports that it is at least half the rate of duty, which averages 22 per cent., and it is in fact much more on all articles affected by the tariff. It was stated substantially in Mr. Clay's time, and it has been more fully stated by Mr. Young of the Statistical Bureau, on unquestioned authority, that in 1815, by reason of changes in machinery and methods of production first inaugurated in Great Britain and since then greatly improved in our own country, one person could do with machinery what two hundred spinners did fifty-five years before; that, by reason of these improved methods, the cost of production had been so reduced that cloth sold then in 1815 for three shillings which fifty years before sold for thirty. I have already shown on the authority of Mr. MORRILL that under our various tariffs previous to the adoption of the present one we had made more rapid strides in cheapening the prices of goods than England had ever made in the same length of time. When the First Congress met one person in every family of six had to spin and weave; now one person with machinery can do the same work for thirty families. Forty years ago one factory hand could weave thirty yards of cotton cloth per day; now one can weave a hundred yards per day. And so the cost of production has been reduced from causes common to all the world. Tariff did not give these results to us, but made them more costly, and has not permitted us to share equally in them.

England, for whose commercial policy protectionists affect derision, has since the adoption of our tariff largely increased the wages of labor and so reduced the cost of manufactures that they sell in our markets loaded with a duty double the wages paid here to produce the same articles. More goods to the person are imported now, paying 43 per cent. duty, than in 1860, paying 19 per cent. duty. The reduction in prices abroad has been therefore at least 25 per cent. more than with us.

The cost of carrying on the sea, where our tariff policy has given England superiority, has been reduced more than one-half. The cost of railroad transportation, an unprotected industry, has been reduced in like proportion. Agricultural products are grown at reduced cost; and but for foreign markets and the reduced cost of reaching them by land and sea they would sell at one-third less than present prices, or waste in the field.

Certainly the present tariff has not paralyzed our people and made them to forget their cunning. All progress in the intelligent use of capital and labor, which creates abundance—abundance in the necessaries and comforts of life—did not end with its enactment. And it may safely be said that to-day the cost of manufacturing goods is 30 per cent. less than it was in 1860. This a protective tariff gives to its favorites; revenue reform will distribute it to all the people.

Results are the real test of merit of opposing policies, say our opponents. This is true when tried under like conditions; not otherwise. Counted in rates per cent. and to many people, Appomattox compared with Yorktown is magnificently grand. With no Yorktown there could have been no Appomattox, and there always will be some people who believe Washington's generalship as great as Grant's. To which shall we credit the price of corn and calico in 1860 and in 1880? Substantially to this question the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] addresses himself. Protectionists credit themselves with results naturally following seventy years of growth and development of this magnificent country under superior statesmanship. Development, growth, and the conquest of nature's forces have been going on and on, so that at the end of each succeeding year we are better prepared for the next, with increased power for multiplying results. Why will protectionists persist in comparing our own country with England after her ten centuries of war and waste? Is this any fair test of the merits of the protective system, and are its friends compelled to resort to such shifts to justify themselves? It is but thirty-six years since England was partially freed from the doctrine still advocated and practiced here. Since then she has doubled rates of wages, (Appendix 3) lessened crime and pauperism, and greatly improved the condition of her people. Whatever lesson is to be learned from her is fairly obtained from comparing her with other densely populated countries or with herself when she taught and practiced our present policy.

TARIFF BENEFITS AND BURDENS.

Having now stated some of the hardships of this system in increased prices and cost of living and the additional burden it entails upon the whole people, let us consider the census facts, (1,) indicating the more general results of the system and how it distributes its benefits to the few and its burdens to many. These facts present results in the cotton, woolen, iron, and steel, three of the oldest and best organized, and silk, one of the most productive, industries. Taken together they will fairly present the results of the protective system. In these the real and personal capital invested is $624,002,630, and the hands employed are 524,726, or one laborer to $1,190 capital. Together they produce goods valued at $810,522,286. After deducting the cost of material used, the remainder is divided $300.16 to each laborer and $300.16 to each $1,166 of capital, which leaves to capital 25 per cent., after deducting amounts paid for wages and materials. It is answered that earnings are not all profits, that depreciation of capital and taxes must be deducted. This answer takes no account of the undervaluation of the product, which is all profit. There is not much profit in the $300 yearly wages to the operative after maintaining himself and family, and he is more taxed than his employer. An impost or tariff tax is an income tax of the baser sort, for it taxes the whole income of the laboring poor, while it taxes only so much of the income of others as they expend in the necessaries, comforts, and luxuries of life. The rates of wages in 1880 were less than in 1870, allowing for difference in currency. The number of establishments were 284 less than in 1870; a great number of smaller establishments have been crushed out by the stronger. And with our help in developing industries the establishments have increased in the iron industry, largely increased in silk, a new industry. The number of cotton establishments decreased. The woolen establishments are 770 less than in 1870. The tariff on woolens shuts out foreign competition and kills it at home. We must have a tariff that will give us both competition in price and competition in quality. The account of materials used in woolen manufactures show that our woolen goods are not quite half shoddy and cotton. The aggregate results of the four industries are given. The tables will explain how they differ each from the other. The average annual wages include the wages of laborers skilled and unskilled, males and females, and, except as to the cotton industry, clerks, bookkeepers, and superintendents. Workers in iron and steel receive per day (300 days in the year) $1.31; in wool, 98 cents; silk, 88 cents; in cotton, 81 cents. Besides the 141,000 laborers in iron works there are 32,000 iron miners, who receive $1 per day, and the average wages for the 173,000 men working from ten and a half to twelve hours per day in iron and iron mines, 32,000 of them under ground, was $1.25 per day. This was in the year of exceptional prosperity, 1880. There were at least five years between 1870 and 1880 when these men received less than 90 cents per day. Wages are higher in this than in any other protected industry. After ninety years of protection—sometimes by a protective tariff, sometimes by a revenue tariff—this system gives to the laborer this pittance of 90 cents to $1.25 per day. It appears from official statements that since the period of low wages in 1878 in Massachusetts, the richest State in the Union, wages have increased but 7 per cent., while the cost of living has increased 21 per cent. The most prosperous mills in that State have recently reduced wages from 90 cents to 68 cents per day. One of the honored Representatives of that State asks legislation on another subject, among other reasons because of "the daily accounts which come to us of strikes in various parts of the country."

With these facts before us as a result of this system, the friends of this commission who profess so much concern for the rights and rewards of laboring-men will surely add to it some provision which will give them some portion of the bounties which it is the object of the commission to continue. The average earnings of a laborer, $300.16, in the protected industries are no more than equal to the wages paid in other industries. This bounty system adds nothing to the earnings of labor, but it gives to each $1,166 of capital $300.16.

A fair business profit of 10 per cent. would give it but $116.60. Is this the "justice to all" which the friends of this commission bill are so anxious to continue?

Who, sir, are the favorites of this system and the beneficiaries of this tax on labor and the products and wages of labor? The manufacturers, who counted themselves 42,000 in 1870 and to-day do not number 55,000, if so many.

WAGES.

The final and flimsiest apology protection makes for its exactions is the wages of labor, which it claims to increase by increased taxation. This argument is purely American and is used not because it is true, but because here laboring-men are a political power. Germany and France like ourselves are attempting to supply the waste of war by the waste of a protective tariff. What are they protecting themselves against? Is it the cheaper labor of any competing nation, or the better paid labor of England, or still better paid labor of our own country? This policy credits itself with the fact that wages are higher here than in densely populated countries of the Old World where people are in each other's way, but it takes no account of the fact that wages are lowest in Germany and France, where the system is enforced, and highest in England, where it does not exist. It takes no account of the fact wages here are as much higher than in England or on the continent of Europe in all other employments as in the protected industries, a fact which shows that the difference in wages in this and other countries is not the result of tariff rates, but of other causes. Mr. Young, of the Bureau of Statistics, tells us that when Ireland's population was less by reason of emigration, those who remained received higher wages; not because of any tariff changes, but because there was less labor and proportionally greater demand. No system of taxation, though it be called protection, can permanently increase the wages of labor or otherwise affect it, except to burden it.

The railroad industry, which is unprotected by any tariff, employs 490,000 men and pays them $237,000,000 wages. This industry alone pays higher wages and more wages than the cotton, woolen, silk, flax, iron and steel, pottery and glass, and all the highly protected industries together. What have the professed friends of labor who urge the maintenance of the tariff under pretense of protecting labor and increasing wages done, and what do they propose to do, to increase the wages of workers in agriculture on railroads and in other unprotected industries? Nothing but tax their earnings by taxing their necessaries and comforts of life. That they propose nothing to protect labor not employed in manufacturing industries ought to convince the most incredulous that to benefit labor and increase wages is not the object of a protective tariff. The unnumbered thousands of mechanics, blacksmiths, carpenters, and artisans who constitute so important a part of the great preservative industrial forces of the country, are not correctly classed as "operatives" of manufacturing industries.

The highly protected manufacturing industries do not sustain 10 per cent. of our people. Rates of wages are fixed by what is earned by nine men employed in agricultural, railroad, and other industrial pursuits, not by the one in manufactures. Changes from one employment to another for any cause often bring with them some hardships, but laboring-men have the intelligence common to their fellow-citizens. If wages are higher in one industry than another protected or unprotected under like conditions, labor goes from one industry to another and thus wages are equalized in all. When labor is oppressed in the Old World its only escape is to the New, over what is too often an impassable sea. It is compelled to accept the wages offered by its taskmaster, and wages therefore are low. In this newer and better country democratic statesmanship blazed the trees to the other ocean toward which laborers find homes and profitable employment, and therefore wages are not so low. When we have no more cheap lands labor will be lower.

In protected and unprotected industries employers pay what will obtain the needed service and no more. In the financial troubles beginning in 1873 there was not profitable employment for all the establishments, and it appeared from the admission of those who came before the committee to prevent the reduction of the tariff that one establishment, the Vulcan Iron Works, was paid a large bonus by the other mills to stand still to prevent a reduction of prices by competition among themselves—the tariff protecting them from foreign competition—but the laborer received no part of the bonus. The men, members of the American Iron and Steel Association, who paid the Vulcan Works to stand still and leave laborers without employment, perhaps without the necessaries and comforts of life, are to-day urging this commission professedly in the interest of labor, and honorable gentlemen rise here and say they believe them. These gentlemen are so credulous themselves they declare it is labor we would protect, and actually look as if they expected to be believed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] seems to be one protected manufacturer—no doubt there are many—who continued his business in the interest of labor at the expense of his own interest, and this is not the only inconsistency of which he is accused. Both politician and manufacturer, he is actually accused of abandoning the protective policy which those who accuse him say is supported by the majority of all the people.

Sir, let us all take courage, when the protective era produces a man, both legislator and manufacturer, who can be accused of devoting himself to the public interest at the expense of his own.

HOME MARKET.

The opponents of revenue reform convert untruths a century old into arguments by restating them. Their first argument was based on a home market for farm products as one of protection's promised results. In 1860 we sent to foreign markets 4,153,153 bushels of wheat, and 153,252,795 bushels in 1880. The value of grain, flour, and meal exported was $23,493,510 in 1860 and $284,126,760 in 1880, with other agricultural products in like increased proportion. The price for our surplus in foreign markets regulates the price of the entire product sold at home or abroad. Two of every three bales of cotton go to a foreign market and one-third of our wheat. Large as our harvests have grown, we must find a foreign market for a larger proportion than before the enactment of the present tariff, and each succeeding year finds us farther from the promised home market. Less than one-fifth of our population produces the manufactures which all consume. Protected or unprotected, the country can sustain less than one-fifth of its population in manufacturing for its own consumption.

At our second centennial, when our people number two hundred millions, manufactures can sustain but forty millions. The value of our agricultural export, now $730,000,000, will be then twice two thousand millions to be sold in competition with the product of the cheapest labor in the Old World, whose cheaper goods our agricultural labor is not permitted to buy in exchange for its own products.

And then, as now, the advocates of this doctrine will produce from the protective storehouse of broken promises and false pretenses arguments based on the necessity of protecting our infant industries, to provide a home market for farm products.

INVENTIVE GENIUS INSPIRED BY TARIFF.

The protectionists, who credit this tariff with all they consider good and see nothing but evil in every proposed reduction, present us with a long list of useful inventions, the alleged result of genius inspired by a tariff which puts a tax on salt for cattle and hogs and makes it free for fish, gives bounty to the manufacturer of the iron and steel in the plow, to be paid by him who holds it. Statistics are not so complete as to justify an estimate of the number of useful discoveries to be credited to the manufacturer who receives bounties and the number to be credited to those whom they pay 68 cents for a day's labor. When that list is furnished I venture the prediction that the useful inventions to be credited to highly-protected manufacturers will be made up chiefly of useful inventions and methods for producing Congressional legislation, so largely as to justly entitle our tariff system to the dignity of a science, the science of winning ways.

NEW INDUSTRIES—THE NEW SOUTH.

This paternal policy now affects great solicitude for new industries. It asks us to believe it would develop new industries, or old industries in new homes, and is especially concerned about the undeveloped resources of the new South. If the South needs protection from Old England, who will protect her from the New? Who from Pennsylvania's one-hundred-year old and long-established industries and her capital accumulated from the bounties of a century? When capital invested in manufactures ceases to be pensioned on our own people it will successfully contend for the world's commerce, depending, it may be, upon the difference in cost of one-eighth of a cent per yard or one-twentieth of a cent per pound. Then capital will avoid waste and must go to the cotton and the ore. The manufacturing industries of the country, chiefly in the older States, are nearly or quite equal to the production of what all our people can use. If it be true that manufactures to prosper or survive must be protected in our own markets, as protectionists assert, and they cannot therefore compete in the world's markets, what is to become of our old "infant industries" in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania when new "infants" are born in Georgia, Alabama, Illinois, and Iowa? Who, then, will pay for Massachusetts school-houses and the musical instruments upon which the honorable chairman [Judge KELLEY] has his laboring people playing whenever he does not have them starving? The anxiety of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts to cut off their own markets in the interest of the new South is another evidence that protection quickens inventive genius and develops resources for securing Congressional legislation.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, sir, this question in its higher aspects is not a party but a political question, affecting the distribution of property and the proceeds of labor and going back to the foundation rocks of our political system. But it is also a business question. In this view what we need is a business settlement of a business question—reasonable and practical treatment to avoid excessive changes, and we must begin at once, for our surplus revenue is becoming the great corruption fund of the age.

Wages in shops and mills are the same as in other works of like kind or less. Wages are not the criterion of cost; it is efficiency of labor that counts. Our wages are higher, they should be, and our cost is lower because the labor is more effective. When the courage of our textile manufacturers and our iron and steel makers is equal to their skill they will demand freedom from commercial shackles and bring the world's commerce to their feet.

APPENDIX 3.

Hon. John Bright, the English liberal, in a speech delivered November 18, 1881, at Rochdale, England, said:

There was an actual doubling of the wages of the laborers in Lord Beaconsfield's own county of Buckingham. Perhaps some of you may recollect a letter which was published almost immediately after Lord Beaconsfield's death, which he wrote to a gentleman who had sent him a book about the condition of the population in the southwestern counties of England, and Lord Beaconsfield said he thought he underrated the improvement in the condition of the farm laborers; that according to his opinion the rise in the wages of the farm laborers had been at least 40 per cent.; that is, 10*s.* of wages per week had risen to 14*s.* per week. I believe, indeed, that in many parts of the country the wages of farm laborers, taking into account the hours which they work and all particulars, are doubled since the free-trade policy was established. [Hear! Hear!] Now, take the other class of men. I walked down from the Reform Club through the park to the House of Commons one day in the past summer, three or four months ago, and a man—an intelligent, respectable looking workingman—joined me and addressed me by name. I asked him how he knew me. He knew me because, he said, "I have been a good deal in Birmingham, and have attended your meetings there, and so I know you very well." [Laughter and cheers.] I talked to him a little about his business. He said he was then getting 7*s.* 6*d.* a day as a bricksetter, and, he added, "formerly I used to work for 4*s.* a day." There is a jump. From 4*s.* to 7*s.* 6*d.* is a considerable leap.

ADVANCE OF WAGES IN THE COTTON TRADE.

Now, I should like to tell you of something that has happened nearer home, for I suspect there are many persons in this meeting who have not the least idea of the actual increase of wages that has taken place among the factory operatives in this neighborhood during the last forty years. I was looking the other day at one of our wages books for 1840 and 1841. I will tell you what I found in it and what I find in our wages book now. The figures are taken over an average of two months at that time and over an average of two months now, and therefore are a fair statement of what happened then and what happens to-day. Many persons here know, of course, all about the interior of a cotton factory, and therefore I shall speak as if it were in a mill and looking over the different people at work. I find that in 1839 the throstle piercers—I need not explain who they are—were receiving 8*s.* a week, and they were working twelve hours a day. I find that now the same class of hands are receiving 13*s.* a week at ten hours a day. If they worked for twelve hours, and were paid at the same rate, it would be 16*s.* a week, or exactly double what they received in 1839, 1840, and 1841. [Cheers.] The young women who worked at the drawing frames at that time had 7*s.* 6*d.* a week; they have now 15*s.*, and that is without reckoning the fact that they are working two hours a day less. The rovers and slubbers got 8*s.* a week then, and they are getting 14*s.* a week now.

The doffers—[laughter]—are considered a class whose wits are a little too sharp—[laughter]—and are sometimes not very manageable. They used to have 5*s.* 6*d.* a week, and they now have 9*s.* 6*d.* The warpers in those days, as far as my recollection serves me—I am speaking of our own business—were all women. They earned on the average of the two months 17*s.* 6*d.* a week. The warpers now are all men, and they have earned in the two months an average of 35*s.* 6*d.* a week. [Cheers.] Well, at that time we had a very clever man as blacksmith, whom I used to like to see strike the sparks off; his wages were 22*s.* a week. Well, our blacksmith now has wages of 34*s.* a week, and that only for factory time, which is ten hours, whereas the man of 22*s.* a week worked the then factory time, which was twelve hours. Now, you see the enormous change to the people in these factories. They have two hours' leisure which they had not before, and their wages are nearly double.

* * * * * * * * *

I think it impossible to account for this extraordinary improvement in the wages of agricultural laborers, of bricksetters and carpenters, and all your factory operatives and all your mechanics, upon any other theory than this, that the new policy with regard to trade, which has made your trade fourfold, has been the cause which has made this stupendous and unimagined improvement in the condition of the people. [Cheers.]

* * * * * * *

The law was altered so that the bread could come here, and a great many things beside bread. Trade has extended and you have added, in Great Britain alone, more than 10,000,000 to your population in forty years.

* * * * * * * *

And yet, with all that increase of population, you have had the demand for labor more steady, employment better paid, the time of labor shorter. The man must be absolutely blind, or worse than blind, who cannot see and will not acknowledge that the great mass of the people, in physical condition, are enormously better off than they were forty years ago.

[During the delivery of Mr. MORRISON'S remarks the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KASSON. In view of the arrangement made for closing the debate and the hour, I feel bound to ask that an exception be made for the gentleman from Illinois, and that he be allowed to finish his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRISON resumed and concluded his speech as above.]

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. KASSON. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it will be more agreeable to him to go on to-night or the first thing to-morrow after the reading of the Journal? If it would be more agreeable to him I will move the committee rise.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Go on to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not desire to go on to-night.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The commitee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2315) providing for the appointment of a commission to examine the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, had come to no resolution thereon.

EDUCATION.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short petition from my State on the subject of education. The petition is but eight lines in length and has attached to it eighteen names.

There being no objection, the petition and the names attached to it were ordered to be printed in the RECORD. They are as follows:

PETITION TO CONGRESS.

We, the undersigned citizens of the county of Rabun, State of Georgia, deeply impressed with the dangers which threaten our institutions, because of the appalling illiteracy of the voting population, as revealed in the last census, for the enlightenment of whom many of the States are unable to make adequate provision; and believing it to be the duty of Congress to provide for the public safety, no less in time of peace than in time of war; and that the enfranchisement of the freedmen by the United States Government imposes upon that Government the obligation to afford liberal aid to the States in their effort to prepare this class of citizens for the duties of citizenship, do earnestly pray that our Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled will take prompt and efficient measures to avert this danger; that moneys raised in adequate amount, and from such sources as Congress may in its wisdom deem best, shall be distributed among the States and Territories, on the basis of illiteracy and for the support of common schools conducted under local laws, under such guarantees as shall secure their application to this object with equal justice to all classes of citizens.

I do this by request of the committee charged with that subject.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 5, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I present a petition of the Board of Trade of Omaha, Nebraska, in favor of an appropriation of a sufficient sum of money to protect and improve the navigation of the Missouri River, and at the same time protect a large amount of property now liable to loss on account of a change of the channel of the river opposite to the city of Omaha. In 1877 the river broke through a narrow neck of land at that point and a great bend of about five miles in length was cut off by this break. Congress at the next session made a small appropriation for the improvement of the river at this point, but the work done was temporary in its character, and the great flood of 1881 carried the most of it out. I move the reference of the petition and the maps and plans which accompany it to the Committee on Commerce, and will ask of that committee a careful consideration of the subject, and the recommendation of such sum as may be necessary to do the proper work.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB presented two petitions of citizens of Kansas, praying for an appropriation for the extension of education to the native people of Alaska; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of certain Government employés in the Post-Office Department, praying to be allowed an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Arthur L. Fish, bondsman of A. Boschke, contractor in dredging the estuary at Wilmington Harbor, California, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1465) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 337) to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the passes between the affluents of the Upper Missouri and Columbia Rivers, for the purpose of ascertaining the distances between the navigable waters of said rivers and the practicability of uniting said rivers by canal or otherwise, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back adversely the bill (S. No. 1732) to refund excessive duties levied by overvaluation of Austrian paper florin. I will state that the existing law provides that—

> The value of foreign coin as expressed in the money of account of the United States shall be that of the pure metal of such coin of standard value; and the values of the standard coins in circulation of the various nations of the world shall be estimated annually by the Director of the Mint, and be proclaimed on the 1st day of January by the Secretary of the Treasury.

By this section of the Revised Statutes, section 2564, it would appear that the Director of the Mint makes the estimate annually, and if there should be a fractional variation or change in the course of the year, and Congress were to be called upon to rectify any such changes or mistakes, it would cause an infinite amount of work and trouble. Therefore the committee are unanimous in reporting the bill adversely. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 328) to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JONAS (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1836) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Morris; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COKE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1837) for the relief of Clark Hayner and his sureties; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1838) granting a pension to Ellen Gillespie; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1839) to amend an act relating to the bonds of officers of the Pay Department of the United States Army, and for the settlement of their accounts; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1840) for the relief of Benjamin T. Reilly; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GEORGE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1841) supplemental to an act entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved August 11, 1856; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

AMENDMENTS TO A BILL.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 172) to authorize the auditing of certain unpaid accounts of the Indian Bureau by the accounting officers of the Treasury; which was ordered to be printed.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. WINDOM. In accordance with my notice of yesterday, I submit the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

> Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether any money has been raised, by contributions or otherwise, from parties in interest, for the purpose of promoting the passage or defeat of House bill No. 5656, now pending before the Senate Committee on Finance, being a bill to amend certain laws on the subject of distilled spirits in special bonded warehouses, and, if so, for what uses said money has been expended; and said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer, and shall report the result of such investigation to the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

NUMBER OF MEN IN THE NAVY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the morning hour is declared closed, and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of bills on the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

The bill (S. No. 1529) to amend section 1417 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the Navy, was announced as first in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. ROLLINS. There is no report, but there is a communication from the Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting of the Navy Department, forwarded by the President of the United States. I ask that the correspondence be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING,
Washington, March 3, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the inclosed draft of a resolution authorizing an increase of five hundred enlisted men in the naval service.

The number at present allowed by law is 8,250, which includes seven hundred and fifty boys authorized to be enlisted annually.

After deducting the number of apprentices under training and the men required to supply the Coast Survey, Fish Commission, Naval Academy, training squadron, Arctic-search expedition, and other vessels on special service, and also the receiving-ships at the several navy-yards, the effective force required for the regular cruisers of the Navy is very seriously impaired.

This was notably the case during the past year, when, as there were in the service the full number of men allowed by law, it became necessary to detain vessels commissioned for sea until other ships were put out of commission and their crews discharged, in order to supply them with men.

The same condition will exist should it be desirable to commission, at an early date, the vessels recently repaired and now about ready for sea service, unless relief be had by legislation.

Five hundred men are required, as the least possible number, to meet the absolute necessities of the service, and the bureau submits for your consideration the inclosed draft of a bill for the purpose of securing the much-needed legislation on the subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EARL ENGLISH,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. WILLIAM H. HUNT, Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. I inquire if there is a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report.

Mr. BUTLER. Is what has been read the only information in regard to it?

Mr. ROLLINS. This was supposed to present as good a statement of the case as could be prepared, stating very concisely the absolute want of the Department. I am informed that there are not men enough to man even the few vessels we now have in the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator what was the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs upon the bill?

Mr. ROLLINS. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. What does the Secretary of the Navy say in transmitting the letter of the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting?

Mr. ROLLINS. Let the letter be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON,
March 6, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of a communication, dated the 3d instant, from the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, recommending the passage of an act to increase the number of enlisted men allowed in the naval service, and submitting a draft of a bill to accomplish that purpose.

The proposed increase meets with the approval of this Department, and I beg leave to suggest that the matter may be brought to the attention of Congress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. HUNT,
Secretary of the Navy.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. PLATT. If we are to have a navy, I should be in favor of having men to serve it; but if we are not to have a navy, I think we have men enough. It seems to me useless to increase the enlisted force in the Navy until we have some ships constituting a navy and something for those ships to do.

Without some explanation more than has already been made in reference to this bill, I shall feel it my duty to vote against it. I confess that I do not know what we want enlisted men for, in the present condition of our Navy, certainly any more than we have. We are diminishing vessels all the while; vessels are going out of service, and those that are in the service are not fit to stay in. What is the use of manning them?

Mr. HALE. What is the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a bill to increase the enlisted force of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. Is the bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs unanimously.

Mr. HALE. How does it come up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the Anthony rule.

Mr. HALE. In regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In regular order; the first case to-day.

Mr. HALE. Who reported the bill?

Mr. ROLLINS. I reported the bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was a unanimous report of the committee, recommended in the first instance by the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, Commodore Earl English, recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, and the correspondence forwarded by the President of the United States. The truth is simply that at least five hundred men are needed to man the ships that are in the Navy to-day. There are not enough men to do it. That is all there is about it.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator whether the Secretary of the Navy made any recommendation in his annual report in reference to an increase of the enlisted force of the Navy?

Mr. ROLLINS. I do not remember. I have not examined the report with reference to that point. The Senator has heard read the letter of the Secretary of the Navy forwarding the communication of the head of the bureau to the President of the United States, and by him forwarded to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill go over to-day without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over for to-day without prejudice.

BRIDESBURGH ARSENAL EXPLOSION.

The bill (S. No. 847) for the relief of the sufferers by the explosion at the United States arsenal at Bridesburgh, Pennsylvania, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, March 22:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 847) for the relief of Edward Shields and others, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

This is a bill which appropriates the sum of $8,000, to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury in such proportions as he may deem just and equitable, to certain sufferers by the explosion which occurred at the United States arsenal at Bridesburgh, Pennsylvania, on the 7th of August, 1875.

The papers on file with the committee, consisting of a report of United States officers convened to investigate the circumstances of the explosion at the laboratory at the Frankford arsenal at Bridesburgh, and affidavits from the sufferers show that a number of persons were employed in the arsenal at the time of the explosion breaking up unserviceable metallic cartridges, and that the explosion was occasioned by one of the operatives tapping on the head of a cartridge-case and causing an explosion of the fulminate. The report of the board of investigation censures the officers in charge for allowing the large amount of powder to accumulate in the building at one time.

The explosion was so terrific as to blow several of the operatives entirely out of the building, killed three outright, and so severely burned and injured others as to make them cripples for life and incapable of supporting themselves.

The affidavits of the sufferers are accompanied by photographs of their persons, showing their injuries. Some of these sufferers are still under the physician's care.

In view of the fact that the cause of these people being injured appears to have been the result of the carelessness of the Government officials in charge, in allowing a magazine of powder to accumulate in the room where the operatives were working, and that they were thus subjected unnecessarily to extra risk of life and limb, your committee are of opinion that these sufferers have a claim upon the consideration of the Government.

The following letter, addressed to Hon. George E. Spencer, chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, by some of the sufferers, appeals to the sympathy of your committee and to Congress:

FRANKFORD ARSENAL, PENNSYLVANIA, February 1, 1879.

DEAR SIR: There is now pending in Congress a bill for the relief of the sufferers by explosion at Frankford arsenal, August 7, 1875, by which accident some of us have lost our only sons, to whom we had been looking with fond hopes that in our declining years we would have them with us as helpmates and comforters, while others of us have left to us crippled children that will ever be dependent upon us.

We all of us have served in the Army for periods ranging from eighteen to thirty-two years, or are the widows of old soldiers, who are now left in a helpless and destitute condition, and thus appeal to you to give whatever assistance to the bill that your just and humane feelings may dictate. Accompanying the bill you will find photographic pictures of the surviving sufferers, showing the character and extent of their burns, and what must have been their great sufferings during the many months of their recovery.

With great respect, your obedient servants,

MICHAEL FARRELL.
HUGH McLAUGHLIN.
HENRY STEGER.
EDWARD SHIELDS.
ELLEN BUTLER.
MARY WILLIS.

Hon. GEORGE E. SPENCER.

Appended will be found the petition of the sufferers, with a statement of precedents in cognate cases; also a brief statement of persons killed, wounded, and maimed by this explosion:

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., January 8, 1879.

GENTLEMEN: Your petitioners respectfully state that they are sufferers by the explosion in Bridesburgh arsenal, August, 1875.

We submit herewith a copy of the official report of the explosion; also extracts from the newspapers of Philadelphia referring to the accident.

Our individual statements inclosed will inform you of the terrible suffering, physical and mental, this dreadful accident has caused us, and we earnestly pray your honorable body to give us such relief as has been given sufferers in similar cases, and receive the grateful thanks of the afflicted, crippled, and widowed victims of this explosion.

EDWARD SHIELDS.

The honorable COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

P. S.—Your attention is respectfully invited to the act of Congress approved March 17, 1866, (volume 14, United States Statutes at Large, page 351,) which makes appropriation for the relief of the sufferers by the explosion at the arsenal in Washington, D. C. In this connection we are informed that nearly if not all of the sufferers were provided with good positions under the United States Government, besides receiving the amount appropriated. You are also referred to the act approved July, 1876, (volume 19, United States Statutes at Large, page 455,) appropriating $3,000 each to John T. King and L. B. Cutler, employés of the United States Senate, who were injured by an explosion of gas. The amount placed in the original bill only covered four cases. Since its introduction all of the claimants, fourteen in number, have joined in the application and filed affidavits of injuries herewith. The amount should be proportionally increased and the additional names inserted in the bill.

Brief of statements of persons injured by the explosion at the Bridesburgh arsenal.

Joseph Farrel, aged eleven years at the time of the accident, was blown out of the building and burned in the most shocking manner both internally and externally. His memory is impaired, and in all probability he will be a sufferer for life. Under a physician's care for ten months. Is entirely helpless.

John McLaughlin, killed, had escaped from the building, but was struck by a piece of timber. He was a bright, intelligent lad of fifteen or sixteen years of age. His father is an old soldier of thirty-two years' service in the United States Army, and makes a strong appeal to Congress for some compensation for the loss of his main support and reliance.

Charles Dearden was blown out of the building and so seriously burned as to render him incapable of pursuing any occupation for over one year.

Herman H. Steger, seventeen years of age, seriously burned about the face and neck. Was under the care of a physician for nine months, and is a cripple for life. Says that 80,000 filled cartridges were stored in the room they were working in. The room was "a powder magazine."

William H. McMillan was blown out of the building and so badly injured that he is a cripple for life.

Richard J. Willis. His mother, who is the widow of a soldier, says he was fourteen years old at the time of the accident. He was so severely injured that he is a cripple for life. He was eighteen months under treatment at her expense. He and three other children are dependent entirely upon her for the necessaries of life. She makes a strong appeal to Congress for relief from her almost destitute condition.

Edward Shields, jr., was about thirteen years old at the time of the explosion. His father says he was injured in the most terrible manner, lost the entire use of one arm, and will in all probability become totally blind. Is at this date (December, 1878) still under medical treatment. His father is an old soldier, and earnestly asks for relief from Congress. Young Shields's affidavit, herewith, substantiates his father's statement, and says: "I cannot explain my case any better than by saying that I am afflicted for life through no fault of my own."

Daniel Ross, under oath, says: "I was sixteen years old when the explosion occurred." He was badly burned on his left arm and breast; was an invalid in consequence for eighteen months. His arm is deformed and the muscles so badly shattered that it is almost useless.

Ellen Butler, under oath, says she is the mother of John A. Butler, who was killed at the arsenal explosion. He was thirteen years old at the time of his death. Her husband was so shocked by his death that he became insane and has remained so ever since. She was left by this accident destitute and helpless, with two small children and a deranged husband to support. She makes a pitiful appeal for Congressional aid.

George B. Zillier, aged sixteen, killed while in employment at arsenal. Claim made by parents.

J. E. Van Sant, burned so as to be disabled from work for six months.

William Deal, injured for life; could not work at all for five months; never will fully recover.

F. Klotz, so badly injured as to be incapable of work for three months.

Howard Altemus, severely injured and kept from work.

The premises considered, your committee report back the bill with certain amendments and corrections of names in accordance with the papers on file, and earnestly recommend that the same do pass.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

LOUIS A. VAN HOFFMAN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. No. 595) for the relief of Louis A. Van Hoffman and William A. Mertens, under the firm name of L. Van Hoffman & Co., and William H. Newman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Louis A. Van Hoffman and William A. Mertens, trading under the name of L. Van Hoffman & Co., and William H. Newman, $18,430.67, in full for the use of the Pioneer Mills in Alexandria, Virginia, by the United States authorities during the war.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is. The report will be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HOAR March 22:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 595) for the relief of Louis A. Van Hoffman and William A Mertens, under the firm name of L. Van Hoffman & Co., and William H. Newman, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

This case has been previously under consideration by this committee, and we adopt the report made in the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, which is hereto annexed:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 752) for the relief of William H. Newman and Louis A. Van Hoffman, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

"The loyalty of the petitioners and their title to the property occupied by the United States are proved beyond controversy. The property, known as the Pioneer Mills, at Alexandria, Virginia, consisted of a warehouse and mill of 80 by 122 feet, and four and a half stories or about 72 feet in height; an engine and boiler-house of 30 by 22 feet, containing two engines and six cylinder boilers; a cooper's shop, with slate roof, of the dimensions of 30 by 100 feet; a vacant lot, and a spacious wharf on the Potomac. The cost of these structures was upward of $140,000. They were on land leased from the city of Alexandria, for which a ground-rent was paid of $1,720 a year. The property was mortgaged to three trustees to secure bonds of $75,000 in amount. One of the trustees was disloyal, but he had only a naked title, having no interest whatever in the debt. He was removed and a successor appointed, who sold the property under legal proceedings, when it was purchased in for the benefit of the holders of the bonds, who were Newman and Van Hoffman, the petitioners. Their loyalty is abundantly proved. They were residents of New York City, and subscribed liberally to aid in raising troops and other loyal undertakings.

"The property was assessed at $75,000 for the purposes of taxation.

"December 17, 1861, Major Bell, commissary of the United States Army, called upon L. J. Anthony, who was in charge of the property as agent of the owners, and informed him that the Government needed it. Anthony replied that the owners would consent, provided they were to receive compensation. Commissary Bell replied that they would receive a fair rent if they were loyal. Anthony thereupon gave him the keys and he took possession of the property for the United States. Possession was retained by the United States until August 25, 1865.

"Five thousand dollars a year is an extremely low rent for this property during this period. The owners were then paying ground rent, $1,720, and taxes and insurance to an amount of several hundred dollars more, so that there would inure to them less than $3,000 per annum.

"The committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage."

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA A. NUTT.

The bill (S. No. 1472) for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Quartermaster-General to examine, adjust, and settle the claims of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, late of Natchez, Mississippi, growing out of the occupation and use by the United States Army during the late rebellion of the property of Haller Nutt during his lifetime, or of his estate after his decease, including live stock, goods, and moneys taken and used by the United States or the armies thereof.

Mr. INGALLS. How much does Julia A. Nutt claim?

Mr. McMILLAN. Let the report be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GEORGE March 22:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1472) for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, have considered the same and make the following report:

This claim has been reported favorably on in the House of Representatives by the Committee on War Claims—once on 14th February, 1877, once on May 1, 1878, and again on 14th February, 1881. The last report, made by Mr. Tyler, is as follows:

"[H. Report No. 251, Forty-sixth Congress, third session.]

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1528) for the benefit of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, submit the following report:

"Julia A. Nutt is the widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, late of Adams County, in the State of Mississippi, deceased, who was, at the commencement of the rebellion, a man of great wealth. He was the owner and in possession of several plantations, two of them in Tensas Parish, in the State of Louisiana, called 'Evergreen' and 'Winter Quarters,' and others in the State of Mississippi. The two plantations above named were heavily stocked with horses, mules, and cattle, and heavy crops were growing upon them.

"Mr. Nutt was always a firm advocate of the Union and opposed to secession. He was so well known as a Union man that the officers in command of the Union Army, including General Grant, General Sheridan, General McPherson, General Gresham, and others, furnished him with safeguards for the protection of himself, his family, and his property. One of the papers in the case hereafter referred to bears the certificate of General Grant of Mr. Nutt's unquestionable loyalty. The commissioners of claims said on this point:

"'As to the loyalty of Mrs. Nutt and her deceased husband the proof is ample. Mrs. Nutt's own evidence was very clear and full to show the earnest Union feelings of herself and husband from the beginning of the war. General McKee, at present a member of Congress from Vicksburgh, says that he was in command of the Union forces which first entered Natchez in July, 1863, and that Mr. Nutt was the first man to step forward and welcome them and to announce that he was a Union man. General McKee was afterward provost-marshal there; it was his duty to ascertain who were loyal. General Grant, in indorsing the report of the commission, says: "I am acquainted with Mrs. Nutt. She has at all times been a loyal citizen of the United States, as I had every reason to believe, as was also her husband up to the time of his death."'"

On the advent of General Grant's army in that country in the spring of 1863, when the other planters fled away, taking their flocks and herds and other movable property with them, Mr. Nutt remained at home, welcomed the Army, and abided the consequences.

Grant marched his army from Young's Point down the west side of the Mississippi River, in his movement to invest Vicksburgh, and passed over the plantations "Evergreen" and "Winter Quarters," on Lake Saint Joseph, not far from Bruinsburgh, where he crossed the river.

The Army was compelled by necessity to disregard the safeguards that had been granted to Mr. Nutt; it occupied his plantations and appropriated to its use a large amount of property upon them. Incident to the occupation by the Army his dwelling-house was considerably injured; cotton-gins and cotton were destroyed; out-buildings were injured, and miles of fences were taken down for the use of the Army. The supplies thus obtained were of great assistance in enabling Grant to continue his march.

It is also claimed that these plantations were subsequently occupied by the Marine Brigade under the command of General Ellett, when another large amount of property was taken therefrom, so that finally they were left denuded of everything movable, and the lands and buildings were greatly injured. Mr. Nutt, in his extremity, went to his bank in Natchez, Mississippi, where he had about nine thousand dollars deposited, which was about all he had left in the world except his devastated plantation, when he found that that had been taken from the bank by order of General Brayman, and, as it is alleged, applied to the use of the Federal Army.

Mr. Nutt died in 1865. In October of that year General Grant ordered a commission to be appointed to investigate and ascertain the amount and value of property taken. That commission was appointed by General Davidson, under orders of General Canby, "to investigate, prove, and assess the property taken from the plantation of Mrs. H. Nutt, on Lake Saint Joseph." This commission, or board of appraisers, as they were called, was composed of Captain J. W. Scully, assistant quartermaster United States Army, James Gillespie, and Thomas Bowie, who proceeded to the discharge of their duties, and on January 20, 1866, made a report in which they recommended the payment of $112,472.16 upon certain articles of property therein named; but this did not include all that was taken on those plantations; nor did it include any part of what was taken from Mr. Nutt or his estate in Mississippi. The report was presented to Lieutenant-General Grant, who, on May 17, 1866, strongly indorsed it, and concluded his indorsement as follows:

"I know that large quantities of supplies were taken from her plantation and used by the United States Army, but cannot state amounts or value. I recommend the payment of this claim under General Order No. 109, of 1862, at the rates paid for the same articles by the Government at the time these were taken."

On presentation of these papers to the War Department, the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General of Subsistence decided that they had no authority to act in the premises.

When the Southern claims commission was organized, Mrs. Nutt, as executrix, presented her claim to that tribunal, which allowed her thereon $56,368.25. This reduction from the amount of her claim, as presented, was made by striking out certain items over which the commissioners thought they had no jurisdiction, and the reduction of amounts as to others, which the executrix thinks was not warranted either by the facts or the proofs. Mr. Blair, of Michigan, chairman of the Committee on War Claims in the House of Representatives, when presenting the bill for an appropriation to pay this allowance made by the commissioners, expressed himself very strongly in favor of a much larger allowance. Up to the time when Mrs. Nutt had presented this claim to the Southern claims commission, she had supposed that all the property taken from these plantations had been for the use of the army immediately under the command of General Grant, but she afterward discovered that a great deal was taken by the Marine Brigade, commanded by General Ellett; but this discovery was made too late to enable her to present it to the commission. The claim for the money taken from her by order of General Brayman was not presented there by her under a misapprehension that the Department would pay it on presentation of the papers. This has been refused her.

It is quite probable that some of these claims for losses of and injuries to property will have to be set down to the account of depredations by soldiers, but the committee are convinced that a considerable portion thereof are just claims against the Government.

The evidence before the committee is not definite enough as to amounts and value of property taken to enable us to report in favor of the allowance and payment, and we therefore report back a substitute bill, referring the claim to the Quartermaster-General for investigation and settlement.

We adopt this report and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, being Senate bill No. 1472.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HADLEY HOBSON.

The bill (S. No. 124) for the relief of Hadley Hobson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $1,648 to Hadley Hobson, of Salem, Oregon, or his legal representatives, in full payment for 13,733½ pounds of beef furnished the public authorities in the "Oregon and Washington Territory Indian war of 1855 and 1856."

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is; it will be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GEORGE March 22:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 124) for the relief of Hadley Hobson, beg leave to report as follows:

On February 4, 1856, the petitioner sold to the United States military authorities 13,733½ pounds of beef, at twelve cents per pound, amounting to $1,648, for supplies to the troops in Oregon engaged in the Indian war. He presents a proper voucher for the same. It appears that the papers were intrusted to a party who died, and who was employed to prosecute the claim. It has never been paid. It is now refused payment in the Treasury Department, because of non-presentation to a military board, and because it is not within the act of Congress allowing that Department to adjudicate on such claims. This is no reason why the claim should not be paid by the United States. Its justice is clearly established by the papers accompanying the petition. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does that bill allow interest upon the claim?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; it allows no interest.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is a pretty old claim.

Mr. GROVER. The claim accrued more than twenty years ago, and no interest at all is allowed on the claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 46, noes not counted.

B. B. TAYLOR.

The bill (S. No. 746) for the relief of B. B. Taylor was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to B. B. Taylor, of Murfreesborough, Tennessee, of $906, in full compensation of a set of regular vouchers, form 12, issued to him in 1863 by Lieutenant George F. Kurtz, of the Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, acting assistant quartermaster, for forage, &c., purchased for the use of the Army.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there ought to be some further explanation of this bill than I find in the report.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the report be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, March 22:

On January 30, 1863, Lieutenant George F. Kurtz, acting assistant quartermaster of the United States Army, purchased from the claimant, B. B. Taylor, corn, hay, and fodder to the amount of $906, and gave a proper voucher therefor. This claim was refused by the commission on claims by reason of the disloyalty of the claimant. At the time of the purchase the United States Army was in full and undisturbed possession of that part of Tennessee where the claimant resided, and where the purchase was made. The claim is fully established, and under the circumstances the loyalty of the claimant is not material. We recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Is not this a new rule that is proposed to be established by this report?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it an existing rule in reference to this class of claims?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a question of contract merely.

Mr. GEORGE. The purchase was made for the Quartermaster's Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT UNION RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1030) to authorize the United States to secure a title to certain military and timber reservations.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause an inquiry to be made into the ownership of the Fort Union military and timber reservations in the Territory of New Mexico, and if he shall find that the title thereto is not in the United States, then to negotiate with the owner or owners thereof for the purchase of so much thereof as may be necessary for the future use of said military post, and to surrender the residue thereof to the persons entitled. He shall also audit any account that may be presented by the owners of said lands for the use thereof by the United States after the title of such claimants was established.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress his proceedings under section 1 of this act, together with such facts as to the character and value of said lands, the use which has been made thereof by the United States, the detriment, if any, caused by such use to the lands or the owners thereof, and whether such use was with the consent of the owners.

Mr. PLUMB. Unless the Senator who reported this bill has some personal interest in having it considered now, I think I shall object to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no personal interest whatever in the bill, yet I think it is a bill that for public reasons ought to be acted on now. There was a military reservation at Fort Union, in New Mexico, located many years ago by the Government on the supposition that the land on which it was located was public land. It turned out that a Mexican grant extended over the entire reservation, and that the title was in the individual who held under that grant.

The original bill, which has been before Congress for several sessions, provided for giving the owners acre for acre the same amount of public land to be selected by them anywhere in the world. We report against that, and provide that the reservation shall be reduced. I think there is an expression of opinion from the Secretary of War or the General of the Army that one section would be enough for the reservation. There are Government buildings on it that have cost, perhaps, $300,000. This bill as amended provides that the reservation shall be reduced by the Secretary of War to the lowest necessary limit, and that he shall return the remainder of the land to the owner and cause inquiry to be made as to what compensation, if any, should be made for the use of it since the individual title was established.

I think it is important to the public interest that this bill should pass. I do not think the individual claimant has now very much interest in it in the shape in which the bill stands as reported by the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. The post of Fort Union is seven or eight miles distant from a railroad line, which is now the only practicable method of transportation in that country. It is therefore of no possible use as a depot of supplies. It is on the contrary a disadvantage to the Government. Every pound of Government freight carried from the railroad to Fort Union by wagon has got to be carried back again to the railroad in order to enable it to be distributed to the posts to which it should go. It is not of any advantage, therefore, to the Government to continue this military post as a depot for distribution, or for any other purpose whatever; and while these buildings probably have cost $300,000, I think I am entirely safe in saying that they are not worth to-day to the Government, for any purpose whatever, $10,000, and if they were put up at public sale to be sold to any person they would not bring that sum.

I have a conviction on this subject, growing out of some knowledge of this bill and of the circumstances surrounding this transaction, which has led me to believe that the best thing the Government can do and all it ought to do would be to surrender to the claimants of this land, if they have any claim whatever, the improvements there are on the ground, in consideration that no further claim shall be made by them against the Government. While I do not think the bill is quite as guarded as it ought to be for the purpose of protecting the Government, I will propose an amendment to be added at the close of the first section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws his objection?

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the objection for the time being. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by adding to the first section of the substitute this proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall also consider and take into account the protection afforded to said reservation by the presence of the United States forces thereon, and also whether it would not be proper to surrender all improvements on the same to the claimants in lieu of whatever claim for use may be set up for the use of said land.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether there is any person actually claiming these lands. So far as I see from the reading of the bill it simply authorizes the Secretary of War to initiate an inquiry as to whether somebody is not entitled to the lands. Is there any evidence that there is anybody claiming the land or any part of the land on which this fort is established?

Mr. HARRISON. There certainly is not only that, but the title has been recognized by an act of Congress, and the Interior Department has reported that these lands are in individual ownership. At the same time, in framing the amendment I did not propose to conclude the Secretary of War upon that question, and but provided that if he should find that there was any defect he might recognize it.

Mr. PLUMB. I presume it is true that this military post is located upon a reservation which belonged to certain claimants under a Mexican grant, which by the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo the United States was required to recognize. A bill of particulars was presented to a former committee of the Senate in regard to the damages claimed on account of the occupation by the United States of this reservation, which embraced certain timber or wood which was assumed to have been taken by the Government, and also a certain quantity of grass claimed to have been cut by the Government, which figured up a very large sum, and which seemed to me to be entirely without foundation, and I think the committees have been constantly regarding it as entirely without foundation.

I believe myself that the occupancy by the Government of a portion of this reservation has been a protection to the estate, that it has prevented the despoiling of it, and that instead of the Government being a trespasser, and required to pay under any proper circumstances of the case damages to the owners of this estate, the Government would be entitled, on a fair statement of the account, to a claim against these owners for having protected it; and I do not want now to assume in anything that may be done that the Government should pay damages to these people on account of timber that may have been cut, or on account of occupancy of land that was not worth twenty-five cents an acre, and on account of hay that might have been cut upon it which otherwise would have simply gone to waste. I do not want in anything that may be done here to seem to authorize the Secretary of War to audit a large claim for damages against the Government. My belief is that the Government ought to-day to surrender the possession, give it up, not merely as a matter of comity or right to the persons who own this estate, but as a matter due to itself that the occupancy of this post, which may have cost $300,000 and is seven or eight miles away from the railroad station, is every day a damage to the Government, on account of the expense of transporting supplies from the railroad to this post, much more than makes up the interest on the value, whatever it may be, of the buildings which have been erected from time to time at this place.

It cannot be used as a depot for distributing supplies to any advantage, because in order to make use of it you have got to haul by wagons everything this distance, and haul it back again. It ought to be abandoned.

The Army clings to it with some degree of affection, because every Army officer who has been stationed there, taking into account the comfort and convenience of the occupancy of the quarters he has had, thinks of them as having a great value, while they really have no value at all. The best thing for the Government to-day would be to take them down or abandon them and leave them entirely. They are nothing but adobe buildings any way. They cost a great deal when they were built, because labor was high and transportation was extravagantly high, but they are of no value to-day even as a shelter. They have to be kept up at great expense. I think the true solution of the whole trouble would be for the Government to give up Fort Union, and say to these people, "We will give up these adobe buildings, we will surrender all our improvements, in case you will quitclaim to us all claim you may have against us on account of damage for the occupancy." I believe that would have been the fair and decent thing to have been done, decent and fair to the claimant and decent and fair to the Government. I do not think any other thing would have been fair.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask the Senator from Kansas if he knows the extent of this Mexican grant as claimed?

Mr. PLUMB. It is claimed to be several hundred thousand acres; I do not remember the exact number.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very largely outside of the land occupied by the Government?

Mr. PLUMB. Fifteen or twenty times more than the Government occupies.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Can the Senator further tell us to what use the remainder of this land has been applied by the claimants, how they had used the land previously?

Mr. PLUMB. They have not used it at all.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then where is the foundation for any claim for grass that may have been cut?

Mr. PLUMB. If I understand the Senator from Nebraska, the persons who claim this land had a grant from the Mexican authorities which they had not set up or had confirmed, or, if not, had not asserted against the Government when the reservation was made. It not only includes the ground on which Fort Union is situated, but also the timber and grass and land of all the surrounding country to the extent of 400,000 or 500,000 acres.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to detain the Senate. I have no objection at all to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas directing the Secretary of War to negotiate with these parties upon that subject and to report his views to Congress. If he shall be of opinion that it would be better for the Government to surrender the whole of this reservation, or the whole of the improvements that have been put upon it, that that is the cheapest and best way out of it, I have no objection that he shall so inform us. As to the bill brought against the Government which the Senator says was a bill for grass and timber, and so on, I do not know what action may have been taken by the Military Committee before, except as I find it in their reports; and I find that the committee at the last session of Congress, I think it was, reported in favor of a measure like that now proposed, which gave these claimants acre for acre, without any exception, even of the double minimum lands of the United States, turned them loose to select one hundred and ten square miles of the best unoccupied public lands in the country. Now, we have stricken that out. If we occupy a man's lands he is entitled to such compensation as may be just; no one can deny that.

I cannot assume that the Secretary of War or any one who may be appointed to look into it would allow such a claim as that which has been referred to by the Senator from Kansas. I think, therefore, it is right that he should look into this claim, cut down the reservation to the lowest necessary limit, and I have no doubt myself that it would be better for the Government to retain these buildings and pay for a section of land than to give up the buildings. There are divers reasons. They may be needed for an Indian school. They are large, extensive, substantial buildings erected by the Government at a cost of $300,000. Still, I have no objection to the amendment because we may get information from the Secretary of War on the subject.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is there any other authority sustaining this claim except the act of Congress referred to?

Mr. HARRISON. There was an act of Congress directly establishing the grant, and it has been recognized by the Secretary of the Interior and the General Land Office. I desire to suggest an amendment at the end of the first section. The clause reads that the Secretary of War "shall also audit any account that may be presented by the owners of said lands for the use thereof by the United States after the title of such claimants was established." I propose to add "and report the amount that in his judgment should be paid."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order after the present amendment is disposed of.

Mr. VAN WYCK. "After the title of such claimants was established." By whom does the bill contemplate its establishment? By the Secretary of War?

Mr. HARRISON. The title has already been established and recognized by the proper Department of this Government, but desiring to still leave it open if anything should show that there was an error, the bill is so framed that the Secretary of War may inquire whether that title has been established, and if it has been, then he proceeds to buy so much as is needed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It says the Secretary of War "shall audit." He will consider that to be a direction to allow the claim, I suppose. I do not know whether the committee intend to go as far as that, to direct him to allow the claim. If the bill used the word "examine" instead of "audit," it would be less objectionable.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment I have just proposed avoids the objection the Senator suggests to the phraseology of the bill. The Secretary of War is to report to Congress the amount that he thinks ought to be paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana will not be in order until the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is disposed of.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to accepting that as part of my amendment, and I ask to amend my own amendment, and then will consent to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana being part of mine. I propose to add to what I have already moved:

And no action taken hereunder shall be construed as binding the Government to any payment whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana being a part of my amendment.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment as modified:

At the end of section 1 add:

"And report the amount that in his judgment should be paid: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall also consider and take into account the protection afforded said reservation by the presence of the United States forces thereon, and also whether it would not be proper to surrender all improvements on the same to the claimants in lieu of whatever claim for use may be set up for the use of said lands; and no action taken hereunder shall be construed as binding the Government to any payment whatever."

Mr. MCMILLAN. I understand from the statement of the Senator from Indiana that there has been some legislation in regard to this land, which, it is claimed, is a recognition of the title of the present claimants. I should like to ask the Senator what is the character of the legislation to which he refers?

Mr. HARRISON. It was an act of Congress. I did not examine the act myself, but only the reference to it made in the papers presented to the Department. There was an act of Congress ratifying and confirming this grant.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The act of Congress is not referred to here, and I have never examined that matter. I should like to know whether any examination of the measures previous to the passage of the act is familiar to the Senator from Indiana, whether it has been before committees of the Senate and been reported upon.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not look into that, nor do I by this amendment conclude the Secretary of War upon that subject, but it is left open for him to examine still as to the title, and whether this reservation is embraced within the grant. It is only in the event that he finds that this reservation is embraced, and I have no doubt in the world it is, under a grant that has been duly confirmed, that he is to proceed.

Mr. McMILLAN. Perhaps the Senator from Kansas is familiar with the proceedings in regard to this act of Congress referred to, and can state the history of it.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand, without being able now to give dates and times, that a grant has been confirmed to sections of land which embrace this post, Fort Union, called the Mora grant. Now the question is whether the Government, having occupied it, ought to respond in damages to the owners of the grant. My own belief is, from a somewhat thorough investigation, that the Government possession has been of great advantage rather than disadvantage to these people, and that if you were to have a fair and decent accounting to-day the owners of this grant would owe the Government something rather than the Government owe them anything. But they have set up a claim and assumed, because there were so many troops quartered on this reservation at certain times, from month to month and from year to year, a certain amount of timber must have been used, and that there were certain horses there fed upon grass and hay, and so on, and that constitutes a claim for hay and grass amounting to a very large sum of money. That has been the claim from time to time set up before Congress.

I believe, as I have from the beginning, that the Government ought simply to say, "We do not want this reservation any longer; here are certain buildings that we cannot use except at a loss;" every single day we occupy that reservation we are doing it at a loss to the Government. It is not that we want that reservation; it is not that we want a depot there. The Government ought to say simply, "Gentlemen, we have occupied this reservation, protected it from time to time and kept it from private spoliation, and we give you now whatever we have got upon it that is of no use to us in consideration that you will release any claim you may have for our occupation." That has been my belief from the beginning of this entire controversy, which has been here for the last six years to my personal knowledge. I would rather to-day that this phraseology should be so changed that instead of the Secretary of War auditing a claim which by this legislation is assumed to exist, we should simply say we will consider whether we have damaged the thing at all, and, if we have not, whether or not we will give it away.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator from Kansas deal with a private citizen in that way if his land had been occupied and certain improvements put upon it by the Government? Ought the Government to say, "We will give you your land back and the improvements simply." Is it not a question of what is fair and just in the way of compensation? I agree that no such compensation as has been named as claimed should be allowed; but if the Government has occupied a man's land, ought it not to pay a fair compensation for the use of it, and can we arbitrarily say without negotiation with the man, "Take these improvements that we have on it, and we will pay you nothing?" I admit that it is a fair subject of negotiation, and therefore I accepted the amendment. If that is the better way out of it in the opinion of the Secretary of War, let us do it.

Mr. PLUMB. The value of the land at best is nominal.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that.

Mr. PLUMB. It is not worth twenty-five cents an acre, all told.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree, and therefore I would not give a large amount for it.

Mr. PLUMB. The Government to-day is occupying this land at a loss; every day it occupies it it is a loss. I believe that long since if the Government had said, "We will give you all these improvements, though we have made some use of them," (and we cannot at all except at a loss,) we could have settled the entire controversy and have had a release of whatever claim these parties may have on account of our occupancy, our nominal trespass.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am familiar from personal observation with the property that is affected by this bill. It is in a magnificent valley and comprises one of the most picturesque, fertile, and valuable reservations of the entire Southwest. The subject is too important to be dealt with in the manner proposed by this bill; the interests are very great; and the Senate are not in possession of sufficient information to enable them to vote intelligently upon the subject. I therefore object to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me? He speaks of personal observation of this. I have none, but I do know that after the military reservation and the timber reservation, about fifty square miles each, were declared, in order to get agricultural lands to be used in connection with the post an agricultural reservation of five thousand acres, several miles distant from the main reservation, was declared, and I take that to be evidence that the bulk of the reservation was not very fertile land.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been there, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

L. MADISON DAY.

Mr. JONAS. I ask to call up the bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of L. Madison Day. It is No. 338 in the Order of Business, and was passed over without prejudice the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does any Senator object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest to the Senator, as I suggested before, not to take it up at this hour. It retains its place on the Calendar, and it can be called up any morning. It will probably take an hour or an hour and a half to consider it. It ought to be called up the first thing some morning, and not consume the rest of the morning hour with it now without finishing it. That is the only suggestion I make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana may give notice that he will call it up.

Mr. JONAS. Very well; I give notice that I will call it up on Monday.

Mr. COCKRELL. No notice is necessary.

CHARLES M. BLAKE.

Mr. GROVER. I ask that the bill (S. No. 1015) for the relief of Charles M. Blake, which was passed over without prejudice in my absence, be now taken up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all payments made to Charles M. Blake as post-chaplain, United States Army, from and after the 14th day of May, 1878, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, and the proper accounting officers of the United States are hereby authorized and directed to audit and allow payments made to him as post-chaplain from and after said date.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill was formerly reported by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER,] from the Committee on Military Affairs; it was reached in its regular place upon the Calendar, and was passed over on the objection of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and myself. Upon the first reading of the bill, speaking of "restoration," each one of us misunderstood it; at least I presume the Senator from Illinois did, and I know I did; and we did not think we had assented to a bill of that kind in the Committee on Military Affairs. On examination we find that the Senator from Oregon was directed to report a bill, but the particular phraseology that we objected to had entirely escaped our observation, and therefore the objection was made. The original intention of the bill, as first reported by the Senator from Oregon, was to do precisely what is done now, and that met the approbation of the Senator from Illinois and myself; and it was because of the wording and phraseology of the bill that objection was made. The relief granted by the amendment is unanimously agreed to by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE. I had some papers in that case which I have mislaid. I do not agree with the amendment which the committee reports. If I had my papers present I should be prepared to discuss it to-day; but as I remember the case, Chaplain Blake resigned when he was insane, and his resignation was accepted while he was insane. It was a long time afterward discovered that it was a resignation offered in insanity and accepted while insanity continued——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would interrupt the Senator to say that the Chair understands that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. GROVER] is willing that the case shall go over until Monday.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have it go over, because I wish to find some papers that I desire to use.

Mr. GROVER. If it can be taken up the first case on Monday morning, I will assent to its going over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the understanding.

HOMESTEAD AND PRE-EMPTION ENTRIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 858) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide additional regulations for homestead and pre-emption entries of public lands," approved March 3, 1879.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I should like to have some member of the committee from which this bill was reported state what change it proposes to make in existing laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] reported the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator is not here.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it go over without prejudice until my colleague returns.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Let it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. INGALLS. To be called up again this morning when my colleague returns.

THOMAS H. REEVES.

The bill (S. No. 279) for the relief of Thomas H. Reeves was announced as next in order.

Mr. GROOME. That is reported adversely.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over

ALEXANDER SWIFT & CO.

The bill (S. No. 417) for the relief of Alexander Swift & Co., partners, and Alexander Swift & Co. and The Niles Works was announced as the next in order.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that that bill as well as the following one, (S. No. 1072,) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay, George M. Clapp, and the heirs of Donald McKay, will be very likely to provoke discussion, and that there is to be opposition to the passage by the Senate of these two bills. They touch the iron-clad claims so well known in the Senate. Two others have been reported from the same committee by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR,] and they have been passed over. If there is to be a discussion—and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] notified me that there would be—they cannot properly be discussed or intelligently discussed under the five-minute rule. Therefore I will ask that these two cases be passed over without prejudice, and at some future day I will agree with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] upon a time when we shall ask that all four may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such will be the order as to this bill and Senate bill No. 1072.

GUY V. HENRY.

The bill (S. No. 1483) for the relief of Guy V. Henry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Guy V. Henry, a major of the Ninth Cavalry, $200, being the amount of his loss for clothing burned at Ogden, in the Territory of Utah, in May, 1881, while lying in the railroad freight-house at that place awaiting transit, without the fault or neglect of Henry or the railroad company, and for the loss of which he has no remedy at law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LADY OF THE LAKE.

The bill (S. No. 263) for the relief of George H. Plant was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the petition of George H. Plant for damages sustained by the Lady of the Lake, in 1874, by a collision with the United States steamer Gettysburgh, be, and is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, with power and jurisdiction hereby conferred on said court to entertain the same; that said court ascertain whether said collision was in consequence of any fault of the Lady of the Lake contributing thereto, and, if not, that they allow the petitioner the actual damages done to his vessel, but no damages for loss of business or trade.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suppose the passage of this bill recognizes the liability of the Government for all injuries done by the vessels of the United States to the property of citizens. These captains of vessels, then, are recognized as the agents of the United States, and the Government is held liable for their acts, whatever they may be. I do not understand that to be the existing law. I do not understand that the Government is liable for any trespass of this kind committed by an officer of a vessel. If we are to make that change in the law, if we are to recognize this responsibility of the Government, then it should be by a general law, and not by these special acts introduced in this way.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is not the owner of a vessel attached to the commercial marine responsible for a collision made on the high seas by such ship? Even though it be the fault of the master, is not that ship liable for the consequences of the act of the officer, although the property may not belong to him?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Government is not liable for any trespass committed by an officer of the vessel.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think this is a trespass of the officer.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This was on the Potomac River, as I understand.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think it can be said to be a trespass of the officer. It is caused by a collision produced by a public armed vessel, and while the vessel is exempt as the Government is from all liability to the citizen for everything; for nobody pretends to say that the Government can be sued except by its own consent. The Government is liable for nothing in any court; but I say that it is not equitable for the Government to allow its own ships to perpetrate an injury upon the property of a citizen and then seek to escape liability upon the ground that the Government cannot be sued.

Mr. HOAR. I concurred in this bill as a member of the committee, but I observed what seems to have been an oversight in the expression, and the Senator who reports it will agree to an amendment. The bill as drawn requires the Court of Claims to ascertain whether the collision was the consequence of any fault of the Lady of the Lake, and if not that they allow the petitioner the actual damages done to his vessel. That would cover the case of the collision being a pure accident with no fault on either side; it would give the damages although there was no fault to anybody. I move to amend, after the word "vessel," in line 11, by inserting "if any, caused by the fault of the said steamer Gettysburgh."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not exactly understand the way this bill will read if amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported as it would read if amended by the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

That the petition of George H. Plant for damages sustained by the Lady of the Lake, in 1874, by collision with the United States steamer Gettysburgh, be, and is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, with power and jurisdiction hereby conferred on said court to entertain the same; that said court ascertain whether said collision was in consequence of any fault of the Lady of the Lake contributing thereto, and if not that they allow the petitioner the actual damages done to his vessel, if any, caused by the fault of the said steamer Gettysburgh, but no damages for loss of business or trade.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am at a loss to understand why, after jurisdiction is given to the Court of Claims in this case, it should not be permitted to adjudicate it upon the same principles that govern cases of collision. We have a class of cases well understood, well regulated by judicial precedent; and why should not this case be decided according to the principles which control such cases?

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Florida will allow me to state my view of this bill I think it goes far beyond any principle of that kind. It does not involve and cure merely the question of the inability of the citizen to sue the Government, but under the provisions of the bill this captain of a Government vessel may have intentionally attempted to destroy that boat and succeeded in doing so, and you make the Government responsible for the damages of his act. I do not believe that that principle exists in law, and I do not believe the Government should be held responsible for torts of captains of vessels.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. As I understand cases arising in the commercial marine, if one ship is at fault in a collision with another, that ship may be libeled and proceeded against in the admiralty court and held responsible for any damages ensuing to the property that it has destroyed or injured, without regard to the intent of the master of the offending vessel.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senators will listen to me I think I can remove their objection. The committee have examined carefully all the evidence about this matter, and they therefore proceed to frame this bill in reference to a case the facts of which they have already ascertained, there being a dispute between the two vessels as to the use of their signals. There is no pretense existing in the case of any purpose, of anything but negligence on the one side or the other. The Senator from Florida, I think, will see by a moment's reflection that it could not possibly be allowed that the practice in admiralty should be introduced in a case of the United States, because in a court of admiralty the first thing is to libel the vessel and the next thing is for the marshal of the court to take possession of the vessel.

It is a judgment in rem, and a judgment in rem always implies, in an admiralty court, the possession by the court of the vessel against which the adjudication is made, as we were saying the other day in another case. That is impossible in the case of a naval vessel, so that it is impossible to have the ordinary admiralty practice extended here.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I understand that; but that is only as to the remedy. The right is behind that.

Mr. HOAR. This bill does confine the liability of the United States, it is true, and the United States ought not to be liable on the principle of master and servant for such torts; and therefore the liability ought not to extend beyond the value of the man-of-war, of the vessel. We have drawn a bill in which we say that the United States shall be liable for the amount of the loss; but the committee know very well that the amount of the injury to the Lady of the Lake, which plies on this river, is not very large, and it is not a thousandth, certainly not a hundredth part of the value of this ship of war.

It is a mere question of phraseology, and not of substance. That is, the committee have ascertained and report that here is a case where a small river boat has sustained some damage. It is a question whether it is by the negligence of the managers of this boat or the negligence of the United States steamer Gettysburgh. We cannot of course say that the steamer Gettysburgh should be libeled, and it would be of no sort of importance to say to the United States that it should be liable beyond the value of the steamer Gettysburgh, because that is manyfold in value the value of the entire boat which was only partially injured. Therefore, the bill practically meets the objection of both Senators, as I understand it.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Florida will allow me to add to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, as he thinks there are no precedents for this legislation, that within my personal knowledge two such acts have been passed by Congress before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to submit to the Court of Claims the petition of George H. Plant for damages done to the steamer Lady of the Lake by collision with the United States steamer Gettysburgh."

JAMES M. WILBUR.

The bill (S. No. 98) for the relief of James M. Wilbur was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the claim of J. M. Wilbur for compensation for putting in the floor, sidewalk, and raised platforms of the New York post-office be referred to the Court of Claims; and that said court be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take jurisdiction of said claim, and to allow to said Wilbur an amount which shall be equal to the benefit received by the United States in the illuminated tiling put in the floor, sidewalks, and raised platforms in said building being thicker and stronger than was contracted for. Said allowance shall be on the basis of actual benefit received by the Government, and not on the basis of prorating the extra work according to contract price.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes; there is a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, March 22:

That in 1875 Bartlett, Robins & Co. made a contract with the United States to do certain work on the post-office building in New York. They made a subcontract with Wilbur to put in illuminated tiling in the floor, sidewalks, roof, and raised platform. The glass in this tiling was to be in this sub-contract put in according to a sample submitted, and was different from the glass agreed to be put in in the original contract of Bartlett, Robins & Co.; but it was accepted by the agents of the Government in lieu of the contract tiling.

It appears that Wilbur put in tiling thicker and heavier than that called for by his contract with Bartlett, Robins & Co., or by their contract with the Government. Whether this was done by an agreement made between Wilbur and the assistant superintendent, Steinmetz, is not clear. There is evidence both ways. But this is not material, as Steinmetz had no power to make the change.

The heavier and stronger tiling put in the roof was of no more benefit to the United States Government than if it had been put in according to contract. On the contrary, it was rather an injury, as the contract tiling was strong enough, and making it heavier increased the weight of the roof without any corresponding advantage.

The increased strength of the tiling in the floor and in the sidewalks and raised platforms was an advantage to the Government. For this advantage or benefit, whatever it may be, the petitioner has an equitable claim on the Government. In order to ascertain this it will be necessary to examine many witnesses, which can be better done in the Court of Claims. We therefore recommend the passage of the following bill as a substitute for the original bill referred to us.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It seems to me, according to the reading of the report, that here was a gentleman, Mr. Wilbur, who had a contract with the Government to do certain work, and then with some agent of the Government agreed to put in different material, more costly and stronger, and now he comes here, after having violated his own contract, having changed the contract, as I understand, from that which he had with the Government, and asks to be indemnified for any loss which he has sustained by departing from the contract which he had made with the Government, alleging that he had an understanding with some agent of the Government in reference to it.

I believe in holding contractors with the Government strictly to their contracts, and if they see proper to depart from their contracts and incur an additional expense they should pocket the loss, and we should not be required to indemnify them.

Mr. GEORGE. I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Delaware that he has not given the exact facts of the case. Variations of the contract were made by Steinmetz, who was acting as superintendent on behalf of the Government. It was the act of the superintendent who had the direction of the building. Whether he had power to do it or not is another question. There is no doubt in the world that the alteration in some parts of the work was of material benefit to the United States, while in other parts it was no benefit. The bill confines the compensation to that part of the work which was a benefit to the United States and rejects that which was not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The objection which I made was that the contractor had departed from his contract with the Government. The Senator from Mississippi says he did that by the consent of an agreement with a certain Steinmetz, who was an agent of the Government; but the Senator from Mississippi says it is not clear that Steinmetz had any authority to authorize any such variation of the contract. This contractor did not even take the pains to ascertain whether he might depart from his contract by authority of any one authorized to make the contract with him, or to permit a deviation from it, but simply by an agreement with an unauthorized agent he departs from his contract, incurs additional expense for the Government, and now comes here and asks to be indemnified for the additional expense which he incurred. That is a very loose way of doing business.

I think that the true policy of Congress is to hold gentlemen strictly to their contracts; otherwise there will be a variation and a deviation from contracts by every one who enters into contracts with the Government. Let us hold them strictly to their contracts, and then we shall have a better service, I have no doubt, eventually, than we have at present.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that this man is held strictly to his contract; he has not got anything that he is not entitled to under the contract at all; but it seems to me also that the United States ought at least to be in the position that an ordinary builder of a large building is in to this extent: There is no private builder of a house or block of stores who does not find that as the work goes forward a great many things which are suggested, which the experience of the work points out, would be great improvements, and which they would have put in the original contract if they had thought of them and had known their advantage at the time the original contract was made. It is constantly the case that such a contract is modified.

The United States, for good reason, does not give any such authority to its agents, but it is pretty hard if the United States cannot at least go so far as this, and why if a change in the structure of a building is so clearly for its advantage that the man who builds the building is willing to take his luck of a voluntary payment to him by the Government by act of Congress if he makes an advantageous change he should not be permitted to do that.

Here is a case where a change in the contract was of so much apparent advantage to the Government that the man says, "I will put it in; I will make the change and Congress may pay me or not as it has a mind to." Congress looks into it and says, "We will let our court, under the circumstances, see not how much it cost you but how much it actually benefited us, and we will voluntarily pay you."

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts makes a very plausible and specious statement of the claim of the beneficiary of this bill. He could not have done it better if he had been presenting his case in court as an attorney. The difficulty is that the facts do not bear him out. There is from the report of the committee no equity whatever in behalf of this claimant.

It appears by the report that by the terms of the original contract the material that was called for was sufficiently strong for the purposes of the United States. For some reason that is not explained, but probably because he wanted more money, he increased the weight of the tiling on the roof, so that, as the report says, the Government was damnified, the walls that were erected only with sufficient strength to support the tiling called for in the original contract were unable to sustain this weight, and have been weakened, so that the Government has been seriously injured by it. Thus far, at least, there can be no equity.

If the case stopped there, the Government would have a right of action against this party for having violated his contract and injured the United States; but, says the Senator from Massachusetts, and those who favor this bill, in regard to the tiling used over the sidewalk and over the floors of the substructure, to admit light into the basement, the weight was increased and the thickness increased, so that although it was thick enough under the original contract for all practical purposes, and so agreed upon, yet the Government was benefited. How? If the original contract was sufficient, how was the Government benefited by having varied its terms so as to secure greater thickness in part of this material? I fail to see the slightest shadow of equity anywhere. On the contrary, the proof is clear and conclusive that by a departure from the original terms of the contract the Government suffered very serious loss.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The hour of two o'clock has arrived, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

JAMES REA.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up and dispose of a very short bill, which is a case of real necessity, and which will take but a moment. The party interested is here with his family and they are reduced to almost absolute want. It is important to him that the bill should be disposed of.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1128) to authorize the Secretary of State to allow for expenditures within named to James Rea, late consul at Belfast, Ireland. It instructs the Secretary of State to allow to James Rea, late consul at Belfast, Ireland, for clerk-hire and other expenses incurred by him as consul, such sum as he may find just and equitable, not exceeding $1,500 per annum for the period during which he held the office of consul of the United States at Belfast, and also the further sum of $600 expended by Rea in boarding and defending certain destitute American seamen at Belfast while he was consul.

Mr. LAPHAM. This measure is in full accordance with the recommendation of the State Department under two Secretaries of State. There is no question about the justice of the case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 4th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 240) granting an increase of pension to Henry Strawbridge; and

An act (S. No. 632) granting a pension to John Taylor.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS,] on which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the amendment as offered day before yesterday by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] to the bill now before the Senate was an amendment that diverted to some extent the object and purposes of the original bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Is it not proposed now as an additional section?

Mr. GARLAND. I understand that the Senator from Louisiana will present it in that form. The original bill is a bill establishing a court of appeals and providing the machinery necessary for the carrying on of the court, and has little or nothing in it with regard to jurisdiction except the matter of amount, fixing the limit as to an appeal and also as to certain important questions arising under the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States that may be certified by the court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The question of changing the judiciary act in many respects was brought to the attention of the committee, but it was deemed best by those who favored a change of jurisdiction in many important respects that it should be deferred and brought forward in a separate bill and should not be made part of this bill organizing these tribunals. That was pretty much the unanimous opinion of the committee; but whatever I may have thought of that question myself, the Senator from Louisiana seeing proper to present his amendment now looking to a change of jurisdiction very materially of the circuit courts, I cannot refrain from expressing my opinion in reference to his amendment; and, offered as an additional section or sections to the bill, I say that I favor his amendment, and favor even doing more than his amendment undertakes to do.

I would have preferred to have had the bill organizing the court of appeals go through by itself, and then bring the other proposition forward as a separate measure; but inasmuch as the question is presented, we of course should meet it fairly and squarely and openly, in all its length and breadth, and deal with it now and presently. While favoring it as an amendment I could not favor it as a substitute for this bill, for I will undertake to show the Senate before I finish my remarks that, while it is necessary in my judgment to curtail a great deal the jurisdiction of these courts, in other words, while I consider it necessary to unload to a very great extent, yet even that done and accomplished, the large and the diversified business of the country requires additional force in these courts.

Let me not be misunderstood; I say that if this amendment of the Senator from Louisiana should be adopted, yet the legitimate and proper business arising before the Federal tribunals, confined within the jurisdiction as it was originally, before the innovations of the act of 1875, is of sufficient importance and sufficient weight and so exacting as to require additional force in the United States tribunals. It then becomes a practical question whether it requires all the force that is provided for by the bill establishing the court of appeals. Early in my Senatorial career, now nearly four years since, I introduced the following bill in the Senate, and had it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill to amend the judiciary act as to suits against certain corporations, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the judiciary act, approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, namely: after the first section of said act, insert, "but no city, town, village, county, or other municipal or public corporation shall be sued in the courts of the United States;" and at the end of section 2 of the same act insert, "private companies or corporations existing and organized in one State, but doing business in another State, if sued in the courts of the latter, shall not have the privilege of removing the case to the United States court."

I introduced that bill again two years after that time. The committee to which it was referred has never reported upon either bill; it has remained quietly in the committee. The Senate will see from the reading of the bill that it is looking exactly in the direction of the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. It goes a little further than the portion of his amendment pertaining to this particular question seeks to go.

The importance and the gravity of the question cannot be overestimated. We are now dealing with a very weighty subject, and if the country is interested at all in any public question, certainly it is interested in this.

I wish to show that the repeal of all jurisdiction of the United States courts over these municipal and quasi-municipal corporations is demanded by the necessities of the times and is in strict accord with the judicial system of the United States as organized by the Constitution and the act of 1789 in pursuance of the Constitution; that the jurisdiction assumed over them was by a strained construction; and that, however long it may have stood and may have been tolerated, it is not the proper construction under the Constitution and the original judiciary act of 1789. If I succeed in showing that, or if the Senate becomes convinced of that from any other source besides myself, the particular portion of the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana in relation to mandamuses against State officers and State officials will be superseded by this proposition which I would ask him to accept as an amendment pro tanto to his.

The first time the principle became ingrafted and settled that corporations came within the meaning of the word "citizens" in the Constitution and in the act of 1789, was by the decision of the Supreme Court in 1844 in the case of the Louisville Railroad Company vs. Letson, reported in 2 Howard's Reports. I may be a little tedious in calling the attention of the Senate to that case, because there is the starting point of this jurisdiction, a jurisdiction which I think was unfortunately decided by the court to belong to these tribunals, a jurisdiction, too, which was established in the face of and to the utter overthrow entirely of two of the long-standing decisions which had the sanction and the seal of approval of Chief-Justice Marshall and the entire court over which he presided. I read from 2 Howard's Reports, page 497:

A suit, then, brought by a citizen of one State against a corporation by its corporate name, in the State of its locality, by which it was created, and where its business is done by any of the corporators who are chosen to manage its affairs, is a suit, so far as jurisdiction is concerned, between citizens of the State where the suit is brought and a citizen of another State.

This is the language of Judge Wayne in delivering the opinion of the court:

The corporators, as individuals, are not defendants in the suit, but they are parties having an interest in the result, and some of them being citizens of the State where the suit is brought, jurisdiction attaches over the corporation; nor can we see how it can be defeated by some of the members, who cannot be sued, residing in a different State. It may be said that the suit is against the corporation, and that nothing must be looked at but the legal entity, and then that we cannot view the members except as an artificial aggregate. This is so, in respect to the subject-matter of the suit and the judgment which may be rendered; but if it be right to look to the members to ascertain whether there be jurisdiction or not, the want of appropriate citizenship in some of them to sustain jurisdiction cannot take it away when there are other members who are citizens, with the necessary residence to maintain it.

But we are now met and told that the cases of Strawbridge vs. Curtis, 3 Cranch, 267, and that of The Bank of the United States vs. Devaux, 5 Cranch, 84, holds a different doctrine.

The judge proceeds then to review these cases, and admits that they do hold a different doctrine, but says the doctrine is wrong, and proceeds to establish what I have just read, that a corporation is a citizen within the meaning of the Constitution and the act of 1789, and therefore the jurisdiction vested in the circuit court where this suit was brought.

This decision was not concurred in by the entire court; it was not a unanimous decision; but it received first the sanction of the court in 1844. The matter came afterward before the Supreme Court in the case of Marshall vs. Baltimore, in 16 Howard, and the doctrine was announced again there, but it was obstinately combated, and with signal ability, by the minority of the court, consisting of Judges Campbell, Daniel, and Catron, in a dissenting opinion, which, if Senators desire to be informed and have their memory refreshed as to this matter, they will look at, and I think they will concur with me in saying that it completely overthrows the idea that one of these municipal corporations is a citizen within the meaning of the Constitution and the original judiciary act.

The question was presented again in 20 Howard in the case of Covington vs. Shepherd. These same judges still fought it obstinately and referred to their dissenting opinion in 16 Howard's Reports, but still it went forward as a doctrine. In the mean time the court had changed its complexion very materially. The principle was presented again in 1 Black's Reports, and there it seems to have received the unanimous opinion of the court; there was no dissenting opinion in that case. But Senators will bear in mind whenever this question has been broached there is no commentator upon the jurisprudence of the United States yet who does not dispute and does not hold in doubt the propriety of the decision in the Louisville Railroad Company vs. Letson in 2 Howard's Reports. Besides being in conflict with the two early cases to which I have referred it was directly in the teeth of that celebrated case which came from the State of Alabama, Earl vs. The Bank of Augusta, in 13 Peters, the opinion in which was delivered in 1839, to which Judge Wayne refers in an after part of his opinion, but I will not detain the Senate by calling specific attention to it.

When the word "citizen" was written in the Constitution and in the judiciary act of 1789, if the framers of those two instruments had meant to include a corporation in that definition, there would have been no trouble and no difficulty in their announcing it in so many words, but it simply stands on the word "citizen," which is left to define itself according to our understanding of the word in our own country, and in that country from which we derive most of our institutions, and that meaning is clearly delineated by the dissenting opinion in the case I have referred to in 16 Howard's Reports.

I have now stated to the Senate the current of decision upon this question. The earlier decisions, those nearest to the period of the adoption of the Constitution and the passage of the act of 1789, those that come near being contemporaneous with those two eras, hold explicitly that such corporations are not citizens. This subsequent decision overthrew the early decisions, but even yet let me call the attention of the Senate to the case of Paul vs. Virginia in 8 Wallace, when an insurance company sought exemption in a State under that clause of the Constitution which guarantees the immunities and privileges of a citizen of a State to citizens of the several States. The Supreme Court of the United States speaking through Judge Field said that they were not citizens within the meaning of the Constitution to get the benefit of those immunities and privileges guaranteed under article 4, section 2, clause 1, of the Constitution.

Thus we have it decided by the Supreme Court that they are citizens and that they are not citizens. The case of Paul vs. Virginia was afterward affirmed in the celebrated case of Railway Company vs. Whitton, in 13 Wallace, where the opinion was delivered by Judge Field also. According to the force of human language, it would seem clear that corporations must be either citizens or not citizens. If they are citizens they are citizens, and they take everything that the Constitution carries to citizens. The Supreme Court says they do not; that they are only citizens for the purpose of judicial jurisdiction to be sued in the courts of the United States.

We have these contradictory decisions before us for us to determine whether the one position be right and the other wrong, or vice versa. It is a jurisdiction that comes at last by construction, for there is nothing in the Constitution or the original judiciary act that gives this jurisdiction eo nomine.

If, then, it comes by construction, as Congress gives this jurisdiction, Congress can take it away, and there is no question that can be raised, so far as that point is concerned, of the power of Congress to take this jurisdiction from the Federal courts. Now, what is the reason lying at the bottom of this, why these corporations made under State law, these municipal or quasi-municipal corporations, as Judge Dillon designates them in his work on corporations, should have a place in the United States courts? They are made under State laws; they are purely parts and parcels of the State machinery for the purpose of local government. They are not migratory; they cannot in the strict sense of the term take up their bed and walk and change their domicile as a citizen, properly speaking, can; and being institutions organized by the State laws for local purposes, a familiar principle lies at the bottom of it, that he who contracts with them contracts always with reference to the law of their creation, the law of their domicile. That is a principle of law recognized by every nation that has a code of laws at all. It is a principle of universal law that the municipal law of the State is the law of the contract made and to be executed within the State; that it travels with it wherever the parties to it may be found, unless it refers to the law of some other country or is immoral or contrary to the policy of the country where it is sought to be enforced.

In your State, sir, [Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair,] you have your municipal corporations, and when you contract with them in the State of Wisconsin you contract in reference to the State law that organized those corporations, and not in reference to any United States law or the law of any other State. By that law the contract is to be determined, to be interpreted, to be enforced. The United States courts at last take the decisions of the State courts upon these local matters; they adhere to them in every instance until they get out into the general domain of jurisprudence, as the authorities term it.

Then why the necessity of going into the courts of the United States, when you simply change your forum? You have your contract still interpreted and enforced according to the law of the State whose tribunal you avoid. Why change the forum? That is the question. You simply go from one forum to another to interpret the same law, and when you go into this new forum it is to see how the State authorities have expounded the law pertaining to this particular question. That is one of the reasons, and a very strong one too, why the dissenting judges in the case in 16 Howard said it was useless to go into the courts of the United States, aside from the fact that the word "corporation" was not included in the term "citizen" under the Constitution and the judiciary act of 1789.

But we are told that what brought this about and made it solid as part of the judicial jurisdiction of the United States is that the non-resident holders of bonds, or notes, or contracts, or whatever they may be called, were without any remedy in the State courts. Let us see, as a matter of fact, if that be true. I have shown you that you must recur to the State laws in reference to these contracts, no matter what forum you are in. If the laws of the State or the obstructions of the State, whatever they may be in the mind of the creditor, affect the contract, he is not cut off from his right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Of course the State may change its remedies, but in changing its remedies it must leave as good a remedy as existed before. If it takes away all remedy then your contract is impaired, and you have an appeal from the highest court of the State to the Supreme Court of the United States.

So, take it in any way you please, you have your remedy at last, the only remedy you could have legitimately and properly under the Constitution, to review this decision or this action of the State authorities through the Legislature or what not that obstructs your contract, that retards its enforcement, or does anything else to defeat it. A case was presented before Judge Dillon (Harrison vs. Hadley, 2 Dill. 229)—there are numerous such cases, but I will read from him because this was a strong case—that appealed to the court for the exercise of its jurisdiction, and his position as a judge and jurist is well established in the country, too well for me to need to speak about it. The complainants in this case sought the jurisdiction of his court because what was complained of was a violation of certain acts of Congress. The plea was insisted upon that there was no other jurisdiction, no other remedy but this. This eminent judge said:

> It does not result that because Congress has not vested in the courts of the United States original jurisdiction in cases where rights and benefits are claimed under the Constitution of the United States, and acts of Congress passed under its authority, that a citizen loses these rights and benefits. The State courts are open to him, and in such a case the rule of decision in the State courts is precisely the same that it would be in a court of the United States. In the case at bar, for instance, whatever rights or benefits the complainant may be entitled to under the Constitution and laws of the United States, must be adjudged to him in the State courts. This rule is imperative, and is found in the words of the Constitution, which declare, "this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."
> If it is suggested that the State courts might misinterpret the Constitution and laws of the United States, and a suitor in those courts might thus be deprived of the rights and privileges claimed under the Constitution and laws of the United States, there is a ready and satisfactory answer. Congress has wisely provided for such a contingency by declaring that in all such cases the judgment of the State court "may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States." (Judiciary act, section 25.)

So that if the party holding a contract against a municipal corporation says that he has a remedy which the State courts will not enforce because they misinterpret it or misconstrue it under the Constitution of the United States, he has an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. If he has a right against one of these corporations, granted him by an act of Congress, by the Constitution, or by a treaty of the United States, he has his right of appeal at last from the final decision in the State to the Supreme Court of the United States. So, upon any ground you may take it, as a pure question of right these institutions should never have a place in the courts of the United States. They should not be permitted to be sued there or remove there suits brought against them in the State courts when those suits are brought in the particular location where they are created by the States.

A familiar principle in the conduct of this Government in all its branches is that the United States acts always through and by its own agents and by its own officers. Here, then, we have the unseemly spectacle of the officers of a State being commanded by the process of the United States, when if the Constitution intended anything it was that they should be kept separate and apart forever. We have the United States through its courts commanding commissioners and town councils and assessors of counties, all of these different officials, to assess and to levy and collect taxes. The thing is an anomaly and a contradiction; it is inconsistent upon its face, for if there is one thing that the framers of this Government tried to stamp upon it, it is always to act by and through its own agents and its own officers; and the danger, however much we may try to guard against it, however much we may say it does not exist, is that this thing practiced will some time produce a collision that may be fatal to the liberties of the country, the General Government, and all the States at once.

We had the spectacle but a few days since in the State of Alabama of judges of that State, judges, too, of a superior jurisdiction as I understand and read the constitution of Alabama, brought before the bar of the courts of the United States to know why they did not do thus and thus, which they should or should not have done, as they interpreted the laws of Alabama. Mr. President, we cannot always prevent collisions, but we can certainly take every necessary precaution to avoid them, and this is a precaution that I think the Congress of the United States should take. Especially as it stood so long without this jurisdiction before the courts construed that they had it, and as we see that the remedy is ample and sufficient already, why allow it to remain? As was shown yesterday by the Senator from Louisiana, for sixty years there was no such thing as the courts of the United States mandamusing a State official, and until the case of the Commissioners of Knox County vs. Aspinwall, that came from Indiana, in 24 Howard, the thing never was heard of. On the contrary, in the early decision of McIntire vs. Wood it was repudiated. That case was fought so obstinately and with such signal ability that the court at last yielded and said it could force municipal corporations by a mandamus to pay a judgment already rendered by the court in a previous volume, 21 Howard. Twenty fourth Howard was issued very soon after the war began.

Mr. JONAS. The decision was rendered in 1860.

Mr. GARLAND. I know it was rendered at the December term, 1860, which term ran into May, 1861; but 23 Howard was the last volume issued before the war began. The twenty-fourth volume of Howard's reports was issued during the war. The matter slept, and we had no more implications of this kind of jurisdiction until 4 Wallace, which reported the decisions at the December term, 1865. There we have two cases, The Supervisors vs. The United States, and Von Hoffman vs. The City of Quincy. The court took full liberty in those two cases, and made one leap to the final result, planting its decision upon the judgment in 24 Howard; and from that time until this we have had a perfect torrent of that kind of decisions in the United States Supreme Court. There is scarcely a volume of reports in which there is not one, and in some volumes there are six or eight decisions of that character. The very last volumes we have contain in 102 United States Reports the case of Louisiana vs. Wood, and in 103 United States Reports the case of Wolf vs. The Mayor and Administrators of the City of New Orleans; and there are several such decisions now in manuscript ready for the next volume.

This is the presentation in short of the rise and growth and progress of this jurisdiction; and for the past ten or fifteen years the circuit courts, particularly in the Southern and Western States, have done little else than wreck the towns and counties and cities within their jurisdiction. In 1879, out of two hundred and forty-five cases on what is called the common-law side of the docket of the United States court at Little Rock, one hundred and twenty-three cases were of this character.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator right there allow me to ask him one question, on which I would like to be informed. If the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and of the Federal courts generally over the matters of which he has been speaking, especially as to municipal corporations, was divested would there be any necessity for the creation of the intermediate appellate court as proposed in this bill?

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Delaware has asked a very pertinent question, but probably he was not in his seat when I opened my remarks by stating that I believed, notwithstanding we sheared down this jurisdiction, which I was in favor of doing, we should need this intermediate court; but the practical question presented itself whether we needed it with all the force this bill provides, of which I shall speak somewhat at length before I get through.

I was proceeding to say that for the past ten or fifteen years, in the Southern and Western States, the United States courts have done little less than through their processes to wreck these municipal and quasi-municipal corporations in the way I have indicated. In some of the States the officers have resigned, but that does not effect anything and ought not to, because it only throws the writ on their successors in office. In some States the Legislatures have abolished counties, and the State courts have held that they could not do that.

So there is no danger, any way you look at this question, of the creditor or the alleged or supposed creditor being defrauded of his rights by waiting for the State tribunals, because these suits existed in the United States before the act of 1875 was passed. Now, I want to give a very strong illustration to the Senate on this matter. It was contended for a long time that a circuit court of the United States in rendering judgment against the estate of a deceased person could order execution and have an execution issue from its own court and enforce it, notwithstanding the estate of that deceased person was in the course of administration in the surrogate's court, or probate court, or court of descents and distribution, or whatever it may be called in the particular State. The allegation was not without plausible reason to sustain it, because the common-law idea is that when a court renders a judgment it has the power to enforce it. That was fought for a long time, but at last, in 21 Wallace, in the case of Yonley vs. Lavender, the Supreme Court held unanimously that notwithstanding you have got your judgment in the circuit court against the administrator of a deceased party, it had to be certified to the court of probate, by whatever name it was called in the particular State, to be there enforced in the process of administration. Beyond getting his judgment the creditor has no remedy in the United States courts; he is remitted to the State court, the court of probate at last, to have his judgment paid in the course of administration. It was claimed that a non-resident creditor might go with his execution and take the estate by the hair of the head, so to speak, and lift it out of administration, and appropriate it to himself, but the Supreme Court held otherwise, and said, "You must go into the local tribunal that has jurisdiction of the administration of this estate, and get your payment through and by its process."

Is that any harder case than the other? Is one case more imperative in the demands of justice than the other? Suppose now that this municipal corporation is a deceased person and has an administrator; no non-resident creditor can go into the United States court and ask for execution on a judgment against it. If the jealousy of the non-resident creditor is so great that he must go into the United States court to have his judgment enforced against a living debtor, why should he not have it there enforced against a deceased debtor as well? After long years of contention the Supreme Court have settled at last that you must go into the local tribunal to have your judgment enforced in the case of a deceased person. I think that is a parallel case and should settle it forever, because the estate of the deceased person is no more the fit subject of local jurisdiction than the municipal corporations that are made by local laws and for local purposes.

I heartily concur with everything that the Senator from Louisiana has said in reference to this jurisdiction in mandamus. The bill that I have read goes one step further and prevents any such suits at all, and then there will be no occasion for any mandamus. The bill that I read refers to another feature which is not urged by the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. I want to get rid of this matter of a corporation created by the State of Kentucky, for example, domiciled there and having its place of residence there, and having an agent possibly in every other State, having the right, if that agent is sued in the State of Kansas or Arkansas, because this corporation is domiciled in Kentucky, to take the case out of the State courts and carry it into the United States courts. That is an abuse which has become shameful and that never received the direct sanction of the Supreme Court until a case that came from Pennsylvania, that of Schoenberger, reported in 96 United States Reports.

According to that decision, a corporation created in Kentucky, for example, can be a citizen in every State of the Union, while a citizen like myself, for instance, can be a citizen of but one State, and for a long time I was not a citizen of any State; and as is suggested to me, in connection with that, by the Senator from Alabama, an Indian cannot be a citizen of a State in which he lives. Now, this is a little too much citizen for corporations. This Kentucky corporation that I am referring to as a mere matter of example may have a suit in every circuit court of the United States, in every State of the Union. That should be prohibited. I hope it does not need any argument to show that that ought to be stopped, because the corporation has its remedy, as I have illustrated already, by saying that the corporation, municipal or quasi-municipal, has an appeal to the United States Supreme Court if any really Federal question is involved. I am speaking now directly in reference to private business corporations which are carried on upon a large scale.

That, now, is the purport of the bill I have read, which I introduced several years since, and which I should desire to take the place of a certain portion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

I have given you the reasons, Mr. President, why I introduced the bill at that early day and why I advocated it then and do now; and if we are going into the business of fixing the jurisdiction at all I shall insist that the Congress of the United States should now take a step in this direction. I believe that I have said all I desire to say in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana and the bill that I have read which I wish to put in as an amendment to his. Now, I wish to say something with reference to the bill properly before the Senate, which will be a response to the question propounded to me by the Senator from Delaware. That question is, if this jurisdiction is limited and defined as we claim here, is there a necessity for any more courts? I think that there is, and I have thought of the subject deliberately and long and patiently, and I will proceed now to give my reasons why.

As early as December, 1816, Mr. Madison, in his message to Congress, recommended "a remodification of the judiciary establishment." These are his own words: "On account of increase of business and widening scope of the country," and as one of the means of helping in that direction he recommended the retiring of the supreme judges "from itinerary fatigues, and the more convenient organization of subordinate tribunals."

Mr. Madison spoke "of the widening scope of the country" and the "increase of business" as early as 1816. This was when we were working under the original act of 1789, with the very few amendments which had been made in that time, with the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court limited to $2,000. The "widening scope of the country" since that time and the "increase of business" have been not four or five but tenfold in proportion to what they were up to the time Mr. Madison spoke. So the legitimate business under the original judiciary act, with the limitations we seek now to place upon the jurisdiction, with this widening scope of country and with the increase of business, requires more force to transact it, in my opinion.

With this vast addition of territory to the country, with all these questions as to public lands, questions of commerce brought about by the railroads and telegraphs and such institutions, I do not believe that the present judicial force will be sufficient even if the jurisdiction be sheared away as I have suggested.

And now I go further in the historical review of the matter. No definite action was taken for some years, except now and then amending the judiciary act, and making more circuits and more districts, till Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, in 1855, reported a bill from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, the title of which was "A bill to relieve the supreme judges of circuit duty, and for other purposes." That was what Mr. Madison meant when he said it was necessary to relieve them "on account of increase of business and widening scope of country, and retire supreme judges from itinerary fatigues." To this bill of Mr. Butler, reported from the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Douglas proposed an amendment, to which I referred the other day in a short debate with my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] much like the present bill that we have before us, with some features different from it. No definite action was taken upon that bill, but every Senator who spoke upon it, Mr. Douglas and Mr. Butler and Mr. Geyer and all the prominent men of that time in the Senate, said it was important that something should be done to add to the judicial force of the country. That was in 1855. Nothing definite was done then.

Then, after the war came the acts of 1869 and 1871, establishing the circuit-court system as it is now, with some amendments from time to time. It was then supposed that by establishing the circuit-court system it would relieve for a long time to come the difficulties that had been experienced. But that hope was very temporary. The business of the country increased. I am speaking now of the natural legitimate business that I consider proper for the United States courts even with the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana and with my suggestions adopted. Then came the acts of 1872 and 1875. I think the act of 1875, as the Senator from Louisiana thinks, was a great error, particularly in reference to allowing assignees of negotiable paper to sue when the original holder could not sue; but step by step these necessities have grown upon us, and ever since I have been in the Senate, a little over five years, we have been flooded with petitions and applications from gentlemen all over the country, lawyers, non-lawyers, judges, mercantile establishments, alleging that there should be more force added to the judicial system of the country, and at every session of Congress since I have been in the Senate bills looking to this have been introduced by different members of both Houses; and finally we are brought to the fact, traveling through this history very briefly, that the Supreme Court, with twelve hundred cases on its docket as it meets at each term, when it adjourns in May has just as many, and the circuit judges are able only to spend a day or two at each particular place of holding court. I believe Judge McCrary does not honor the city of Little Rock with his presence but once a year, and then only for two or three days. Something has to be done by way of securing more working force, by way of labor-power added to these courts.

This bill does not embody my plan by way of relief, as is known to the members of the committee, but I have agreed to it as the best the committee could get, and we have taken all the sentiments for and against the various propositions and compared them and voted upon them. I believe, after long and anxiously looking into this matter, that this is the best we can do, next to the system which I proposed and which the Committee on the Judiciary voted down, and now I will state briefly to the Senate what that was.

I was in favor of taking the Supreme Court judges entirely away from the circuits, as Mr. Madison proposed in 1816 and as the bill of Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, proposed in 1855, to hold them here in this city nine months in the year, and to require them to decide cases brought to them by appeal, and nothing else; for I believe upon a fair construction of the Constitution they are meant to be an appellate court, and an appellate court only, and that its judges are not to go around upon circuit and sit at nisi prius, notwithstanding the early judiciary act did so fix it. In reference to the appellate jurisdiction, they are appellate judges, properly speaking, and should not be mixed up with original trials in the courts below.

I favored also, as I stated the other day, the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST;] for I do not believe an appellate court ought to know anything about the parties or the litigation below. I would rather, as I said the other day, the appellate judge should be blindfolded and let the case before him stand as that of Seius vs. Titius, or John Doe against Richard Roe.

Then I was in favor, in addition to that, of judges of the Supreme Court not being permitted to deliver any dissenting opinions in any case. They have become a curse to the country, in my judgment, because the time that is taken up in writing those opinions and delivering them would measure about one-third the time that the court devotes to business, and certainly nearly one-third of the volumes in which they appear is given up to them.

Mr. President, think for a moment of the purpose of a court. It is not to establish abstract principles of law; it is not to find the ideal standard of right and wrong, but it is simply to say what is the law in a given case. It is not to write law-books for the profession; it is not to encourage litigation. If the opinion goes out as the unanimous opinion of the court, you build up around it a respect and a confidence for it which does not otherwise exist. I am sorry to say that our judges are too much given to writing law-books for the profession, commencing in every case with "the law is a rule of action commanding so and so and forbidding so and so," then going on to the particular questions involved in the case. I would take the opinions, if I had my way, back to the time of Coke, simply declaring that the facts in the case are such, and such and such is the law; and I would not compel the judges to search from California to Arkansas and then to New York for some authority on the particular case, and perhaps when it is found it does not apply to it and has reference to an entirely different state of case. The purpose of a court is to establish what the law is in the particular case and where the right is. It makes a man's head swim to hear the recital of the Senator from Alabama the other day as to the way the law-books are growing in this country.

I believe the third volume of Wallace was the first that came out after the war. That was seventeen years ago. There are twenty-three volumes of Wallace altogether, so that there are twenty volumes of Wallace since the war and thirteen volumes of Otto, and we are now to 103 United States Reports. The thirteen and the twenty make thirty-three volumes in seventeen years of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, almost precisely two volumes a year. No man on earth can keep up with them. A man cannot buy a library. It is an old saying that a man with one book is a dangerous man, and those of us who practice law shall have to be remitted back, after a while, to that condition. There are opinions of the Supreme Court now awaiting publication more than sufficient to make the one hundred and fourth volume of United States Reports. So we shall have before this year passes away two volumes for each of the seventeen years since the war, and much of them is taken up by the dissenting opinions of the judges. I think that is an evil that ought to be suppressed; and with continuous work here and withholding those dissenting opinions, and publishing opinions directly upon the case, and not writing legal essays for the profession at large, I think the Supreme Court would be enabled to get along much more rapidly and much more easily than it does, and by confining it strictly and truly to its appellate duties in cases that come up from the courts below, the business would soon be brought up so that cases could be promptly heard.

The committee did not see proper to agree to these propositions. Then what else shall be done? We have had, I undertake to say, a dozen or various propositions introduced by different Senators. We have had suggestions and propositions that were never introduced in the Senate, and sent to us directly, which we considered. We had the bill of a Mr. Maury, which has been offered as a substitute by the Senator from Alabama, and which he has maintained before the Senate so ably. That was considered maturely in connection with all these different propositions. The committee finally agreed upon this bill for the reasons indicated the other day by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] who introduced the original bill, and which I will not attempt now to elaborate; but I will state, for the reflection of the Senator from Alabama and others, the controlling motive with me about it.

I think if we are going to establish these systems or any of them, we should bring them as near to the people as possible. We bring the circuit court, for instance, of which my State forms a part, to Saint Louis; New Orleans is the place for another circuit court, Richmond for another, and so on—nine different points throughout the Union.

These courts are more convenient for litigants and for the attorneys than an appellate court here on the plan of Mr. Maury would be, in my judgment, and it brings the circuit judges from the particular circuit who are acquainted with the system of laws, the jurisprudence of those particular sections, to see and consult and act together The bill of Mr. Maury was presented before the committee in an able argument by himself, strong and convincing, too, in many respects.

The Senator from Louisiana complained yesterday of the feature of the bill fixing $10,000 as the limit for appeals to the Supreme Court. Under the Constitution this appellate jurisdiction is given subject to such rules and regulations as Congress may establish. You have got to fix some limit, and any limit is to a certain extent more or less arbitrary. There was complaint that $2,000 used to be too large a sum, that it cut out the poor man.

There was great complaint after that that $5,000 was too much; that made an appeal too much a rich man's luxury. By this bill we have an intermediate court whose decisions I think in a great majority of the cases the parties litigant will be satisfied with and will not ask to have a third hearing before the Supreme Court of the United States. Some limit must be fixed; and if you fix it at $1,000, $5,000, or any other sum, there will be complaint as a matter of course. You must stop at some point; and considering that these courts are put between the Supreme Court and the subordinate courts of original jurisdiction, we thought that $10,000 was a proper and sufficient limit. There is another reason to which I ask the attention of the Senator from Louisiana. Under this bill any important case, any case of sufficient importance in the estimation of the judges, may be certified to the Supreme Court for its opinion.

Mr. BAYARD. That is not the provision in the bill now, I think.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. BAYARD. As I understand, that is confined solely to cases of copyright and patent.

Mr. GARLAND. No. I was going on to say that it applies to causes under the Constitution, laws, and treaties. In the same section that confers the original jurisdiction any question of importance that arises under the Constitution, treaties, or laws of Congress may be certified by the court of appeals for the opinion of the Supreme Court. Inasmuch as we had to stand upon some particular sum, with these precautions and safeguards, it strikes me we have come to about as equitable a standard as we could fix.

If what I am contending for with the Senator from Louisiana, limiting the jurisdiction of these courts, can be accomplished, I do not think we need all the force that this court-of-appeals bill gives us. I think we can cut it down about one-half, establish these intermediate courts with one more circuit judge appointed in each circuit, make the quorum three instead of four, and have the court consist of five instead of six. Then I believe our judicial system will be about as complete and about as fair as we can get it.

I know that any bill we can pass will meet with objections. I know it will meet with difficulties; all bills do. This is something of a pioneer experiment; it is something of an experiment almost entirely; it is yet to be tested; it is to be tried in the crucible yet, to see whether or not it will stand. After long and laborious examination of the question I have laid before the Senate (though at more length than I expected to do when I rose) my honest convictions in reference to the entire question, and of course it is with the Senate to say what they will do with the measure.

I wish to make one more remark, and that is in reference to the judges. We have all in the Southern States to some extent suffered from the troubles of which the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from South Carolina have complained. But if there have been evils of that sort existing in any State, I think the passage of a bill like this in putting men in these courts of appeal to supervise the rulings and the acts and doings of the judges who are complained of will secure relief in that respect. We have not the appointing of the judges; and I cannot stand and wait for events to take place, because the business of the country must go on. The administration is here and there is a crying necessity all over the country, the lawyers in my State of both parties and both the judges are clamoring for some relief to be given. Adopting the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana with the suggestion of the bill of my own, I believe sincerely and honestly that this bill with the force possibly sheared down to about one-half, as I have indicated, will be a measure that will bring relief for some time to come; how long we cannot tell, because this country is growing, and it will grow and must grow; and it is an illustration at last of the fact that governments are not made but governments grow as the country grows. If we get rid of the fiction in these courts of a municipal corporation being a citizen, we shall have made a long stride in the proper direction, because, as was said by Judge Curtis himself in reviewing this very question, the jurisdiction comes at last from a miserable fiction.

This is all I shall have to say probably on the bill at all. I have stated honestly, fairly, and candidly to the Senate my views; and with the additions and suggestions I have stated incorporated in it I hope the bill now before the Senate will pass.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, bills for the relief of the courts of the United States have been before Congress for a good many years, and my recollection is that there has never been one agreed upon before by a Judiciary Committee of either House. For the first time, then, we have this condition of things, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas. All of the various propositions have been submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, made up of the ablest minds of the country; they have expended great time, care, research, and investigation, and have finally unanimously, as I understand, agreed upon a bill for this court of appeals.

Now, for the first time, I say, since the war we are in the condition of having a unanimous Judiciary Committee for a court of appeals, every man admitting that the Supreme Court must be relieved in some way. I confess it was with great pleasure that I heard the Senator from Illinois introduce this bill and finally speak to it from the floor of the Senate. It seemed to me that the hour had come when something was to be effected. Now the whole thing is dead at once. The Senator from Louisiana offers an amendment, and as he offered the amendment it provided for striking out the whole of this bill except the enacting clause and substituting a bill touching the jurisdiction of the United States courts. On the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, however, he proposes to offer it as a separate section and an amendment by way of addition to the pending bill. If the proposition originally made by the Senator from Louisiana had been adhered to and adopted by the Senate, it would have had no more effect upon the pending bill than it will have upon it if the Senate adopts it as a separate section. It will be the death at once of this bill which has received such care and examination on the part of the Senate Judiciary Committee. And yet the Senator from Arkansas approves of it, accepts the reasons for it, and even states that he had a proposition of his own to the same effect!

Mr. President, propositions of this kind have been before these two Houses for a score of years. There has not been a session of Congress for fifteen years at least that there have not been bills pending before both Houses touching the jurisdiction of the United States courts. When I was a member of the Judiciary Committee in the other branch, I remember I was on a sub-committee with a Representative from Texas, Mr. CULBERSON, one of the best lawyers in the House of Representatives, too, and Mr. CULBERSON and I sat down faithfully to prepare a bill repealing certain acts which had created new jurisdiction for the courts of the United States. We spent one solid month in careful examination and in careful consideration of a bill to that end; and finally we agreed, he from Texas satisfied, I from the other end of the country satisfied too, and we reported that bill to a Democratic House, and it is not a law. A Democratic Senate was here; it did not become a law. And yet as I say it was as carefully considered a bill touching the jurisdiction of the United States courts and limiting that jurisdiction as such gentlemen as he and I could draft after a month of care bestowed upon it.

Here is a proposition to take this bill providing for a court of appeals, which necessarily will meet with certain opposition in and of itself, and ingraft upon it another proposition which has heretofore met with so much opposition even in a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate that it never yet has become a law.

Mr. JONAS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. JONAS. What has politics got to do with this matter? What difference does it make whether the House was Democratic or the Senate was Democratic? Is there a question of politics in the amendment I have offered?

Mr. FRYE. It makes this difference, if the Senator will allow me, and he knows the difference it makes as well as I do, that the provisions conferring new jurisdiction upon the United States courts have been ingrafted upon our law through and following the war, from the necessities of the war, from the circumstances of the war and the years following the war; and, therefore, it is perfectly natural that Senators and Representatives in Congress from the South should be the Senators and Representatives desiring the repeal of these sections. That is why to a certain extent politics comes in. I never have heard Senators and Representatives from the North demanding the repeal of these sections. I have heard, and I know, and I myself concur with the Senator from Louisiana that that jurisdiction needs amendment in very many respects.

I recognize that the circumstances have passed away; I recognize that the necessities do not exist to-day; and, as I said when I commenced to speak, I agreed with the distinguished representative from Texas as to what portions of that jurisdiction should be taken away from the courts of the United States. It is not of that that I complain; I believe that the law should be modified; but what I complain of is that it should be put upon this bill providing for a court of appeals, that when a distinguished committee like that on the judiciary has spent a month in considering this bill providing for a court of appeals, the Senator from Louisiana, rising here in his seat, without any investigation by the committee, without any examination by the Senate, should propose to ingraft upon that bill a provision which, though carefully considered before and reported to both branches of Congress, met with that amount of opposition that defeated it; for the Senator from Louisiana must know, the Senator from Arkansas must know, that to put that as an amendment on this bill under these circumstances will simply defeat both measures.

Mr. JONAS. I should like to ask the honorable Senator a question, if he will yield.

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. JONAS. I ask whether I have not a right to offer amendments to a pending bill with a view of perfecting or improving that bill if in my judgment I think it proper to do so?

Mr. FRYE. The Senator is exceedingly sensitive. I have not questioned his right to offer amendments.

Mr. JONAS. I am not sensitive at all; but I ask the honorable Senator whether it is not a legislative privilege, a legislative duty on my part, to try to perfect legislation as much as possible before voting upon it?

Mr. FRYE. Unquestionably.

Mr. JONAS. Then why does the honorable Senator complain of it?

Mr. FRYE. But I do not understand it to be a legislative duty to offer an amendment to a bill providing for a court of appeals, which under strict parliamentary rule is not germane to the bill itself.

Mr. JONAS. We are not discussing an appropriation bill now. Everything is germane.

Mr. FRYE. Everything may be germane in the Senate. I admit that. I have come to the conclusion that almost anything is, and almost anything is within the rules in the Senate. It would not be germane in some other bodies that I have served in.

I hope the Senator will understand me. I am not opposing his proposition; I am simply opposing the loading a carefully prepared bill to provide for a court of appeals, which this country needs, with this amendment which has not been considered by any committee of the United States Senate. That is the only objection I make to it. It is shown that it needs much more examination than can possibly be given to it in this debate. The Senator from Arkansas says that he has a bill to the same effect with divers other provisions touching the jurisdiction of the United States courts. Now, there are bills to-day pending before the Judiciary Committee of the House and bills pending before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate touching the jurisdiction of the United States courts. Why is it not better for the Senate to leave those bills to themselves, to leave them to the committees having them in charge; and then when those committees have investigated and reported to the Senate, to pass upon them by themselves, rather than to have us at any rate lose this bill for a court of appeals by undertaking to ingraft them upon this?

Mr. President, I wish to be distinctly understood as not discussing the question of the jurisdiction of the United States courts, as not raising any question about the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, as not agreeing or disagreeing with him or pretending to touch his measure, but as only asking the Senate to let us take the considered bill and vote upon that, and when the question of jurisdiction is presented to us by any other considered bill let us then vote upon that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that this bill go over until Tuesday next at two o'clock. My reason for it is that I am informed that the American Bar Association, through a very able committee, of which Mr. Merrick and other gentlemen are members, have had the subject of the change in our judicial system under consideration for some months, and are about to print a report, and that for some reason or other it has been delayed in the publication until Monday, of which we have not the benefit. I have seen proof sheets of that report, and it has impressed me very greatly, particularly on the question of the constitutional power of Congress to divide the Supreme Court into sections. I think it is worth while that the Senate should pause and hear the bar association, representing the intelligence of the bar of the United States, before we undertake to have final action on this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I sincerely hope that the motion of the Senator from Alabama will not prevail. The bar associations of nearly all the States of this Union, the Western States particularly, have petitioned Congress to pass this bill for intermediate courts. The American Bar Association are divided upon this question, and their committee is divided equally. They are divided upon the question of whether to increase the number of judges of the Supreme Court or to have an intermediate court of appeals. This American Bar Association consists of a few gentlemen who meet at Saratoga; I was with them last summer, and very few were there. A committee was appointed to take up this subject of law reform. Four of them, as I understand, embracing Mr. Merrick, Mr. Evarts, Mr. Phelps of Vermont, and one other gentleman, advocate an increase in the number of judges of the Supreme Court. Mr. Hitchcock, of Saint Louis, Chief Justice Bradley, formerly of Rhode Island, who is now, I think, a Professor at Harvard, Mr. Rufus King, of Cincinnati, and another gentleman whose name I do not recollect, advocate this bill as the proper measure of relief.

Now, is the Senate of the United States going to postpone a measure of this kind to get the views of these gentlemen on one side or the other? Are we not competent to decide it? Have we not had this subject under consideration as long as they have? Cannot we ourselves determine this question as well as they? If there is any gentleman who thinks there ought to be an increase in the number of judges of the Supreme Court, and that that is the proper mode of reaching the evils complained of, he ought to vote against this bill. If, however, a majority of the Senate believe that the system of intermediate courts is the proper remedy to adopt, then they ought to vote for this bill. I know that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States with one exception are in favor of this bill, and as I understand that gentleman has yielded his opinion on the subject; I know that all the rest are for it. Shall we adjourn this case to Tuesday in the Senate of the United States to get the opinion of any gentlemen, no matter how respectable they are? Those who are in favor of an increase in the number of judges of the Supreme Court, who touch upon this question of the constitutionality of dividing it, are very respectable gentlemen, and so are those on the other side, from the American Bar Association who were appointed to consider this subject of law reform.

The Judiciary Committee of the Senate have had the views of everybody on the subject. The bar of Saint Louis, the bar of Missouri, the Legislature of Wisconsin, the bar of Wisconsin, the bar of Indiana, the bar of Illinois, I recollect distinctly, all petitioned Congress in favor of this bill; and now, after it has been considered by the Judiciary Committee, after all these plans have been taken into consideration, shall we postpone this bill for two days to get the opinion of three or four eminent lawyers in the United States? It strikes me that it is an unheard-of proposition, and I sincerely hope it will not be agreed to. I am not asking the Senate to finish the bill to-day if they are not ready to do so, but I want the bill considered just as any other bill is.

Mr. BECK. I shall vote for the postponement. However well advised the Committee on the Judiciary may be, the differences of opinion developed among them and the very great importance of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, make it necessary for some of us who have not had the same opportunity to get the information we may obtain, even from gentlemen who form a committee that is equally divided. I think the Senator from Illinois must agree that if it is important for the Congress of the United States to wait two years till they get information from a body of somewhat interested experts before they can act upon the subject of taxation, we can afford to wait two days till we can get valuable information from a disinterested body of experts relative to a much mooted question.

I do not think there will be any great incongruity in that, and I should like to ask some of these gentlemen who are experts at the American bar how it has happened that for twenty years there has not been a man attached to the party I belong to who has been found fit either to occupy a place on the Supreme Court bench or the circuit or the district benches, and we might perhaps get some reason assigned why somebody who was not a strict partisan should be allowed to sit on the bench. A day or two, I think, would not hurt on that point.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Why should the matter of the appointment of judges be brought up now? I was a member of the old Whig party; and when I was a Whig the Democrats had possession of the power of this country and no Whigs were appointed on the bench. There has been no instance in the history of this country since its formation that the party in power did not appoint judges who were in sympathy with the political views of the party in power. I believe that one-half these judges ought to be appointed from the minority; but it is not a matter of right in any case. I do not recognize that the minority have a right to demand any such thing from the party in power; and the party in power have always from the foundation of this Government appointed judges from those in sympathy with them; but I do not think it is a wise thing to do. I myself would break it up if I had the power to do so, and I would divide these judges. There are eighteen, and I would give one-half to the party in opposition and one-half to the Republicans, if I could have my own way about it. I do not know what will be done; but if I had the advising of the appointing power, I should advise him to do that. But that has not anything to do with the question of the postponement of this measure until next Tuesday.

Mr. BECK. It has this to do with it: Everybody for at least twenty years, as I know, that has been selected for any position has been selected because of his politics. If the proposition of the Senator from Louisiana prevails, and we repeal many of the laws that have been giving jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, and do away with jurisdiction that has been seized by the Supreme Court, if you please, for all courts lean in favor of their own jurisdiction and extend it all they can——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is not so of all courts.

Mr. BECK. I know of course it is not so if the Senator asserts it; but I never knew a court, from a justice of the peace up to the Supreme Court of the United States, that would not extend its own powers and jurisdiction where it could.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator is very unread in the law.

Mr. BECK. I am not quite as well read in the law as the Senator from Illinois, I admit, but I think I have as much practical knowledge of the common sense of things as he has; and I know that is the way the world goes, and I never knew an instance to the contrary.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The books are full of such instances.

Mr. BECK. If ever there was a case where any of them did not assume all the jurisdiction they could get and hold on to it as long as they could, I do not know the instance; and I do not think the Senator from Illinois would be any exception to that rule, and I do not think I should be if I were in a place of that sort. I know of no court from Judge Bond up or down that is not seizing jurisdiction and, when they can with impunity or think it will favor their purpose, abusing it.

The proposition made by the Senator from Louisiana will curtail jurisdiction, will prevent assignees who are living in other States from suing when they have no legal interest, except that of mere stake-holders on bills of exchange and bonds assigned, where the original parties both live in the same State, and where jurisdiction is assumed because a transfer is made, perhaps nominally, to a man who lives in another State. If this can be adopted, and other transfers that have been authorized can be repealed, and we can get relief in that way while maintaining the present condition of things or extending it in a modified form, I prefer doing that rather than have the courts of the States absorbed by the Federal courts, making it to the interest of everybody to look to this great political system of courts radiating from Washington regardless of the States, degrading the courts of the States and the bars of the States, in order to make this a great paternal government, or a nation spelled with a wonderfully big N. A little time taken in order to see if we can accomplish the same object and give relief by curtailing the present powers of the United States courts and cutting off their abuse may not be misspent. That would surely be as well as to extend the system by eighteen more judges, who it is admitted will be politicians as the Senator from Illinois says they always have been, and I assume that what always has been always will be. Time taken for a couple of days to get the advice or information from a very able body of men on such a matter will not be time thrown away.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This able body of men will not give any information on that subject at all. It is a pretense, then, to postpone this bill until Tuesday to get the views of those gentlemen, because they do not discuss this question at all. They do not go into the question of the jurisdiction of the courts. I happen to know about that, for I know what their views are. They simply speak of the creation of courts under the two antagonistic systems. They do not go into details, and they do not discuss jurisdiction. One side is in favor of enlarging the number of judges of the Supreme Court, and the other is in favor of the intermediate courts; but they do not discuss the question of jurisdiction. The Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Kentucky want to continue this case, not to get the views of these gentlemen, but to consider this question further. Are they not as able to decide on the question to-night as at any other time? If they want to vote for it, cannot they vote on that amendment just as well to-night as on Monday or Tuesday? Is any Senator likely to change his views on the question of whether the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana should be adopted or not?

The whole question of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the circuit courts needs revision, but it is an improper thing to put into a bill which creates a court and says nothing upon the subject of jurisdiction. The court created by this bill is an appellate tribunal, nothing else in the world. The jurisdiction of the circuit court and the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is not altered one whit by this bill. Now all appeals and writs of error go immediately to the Supreme Court. By this bill appeals and writs of error will go to an appellate, which has appellate jurisdiction entirely and no original jurisdiction at all, and from that court certain cases will go to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the amount involved is $10,000, where a Federal question is involved, or where the court shall certify that the question is of such importance that the Supreme Court of the United States should make a decision upon it. That is the whole bill, nothing else in the world.

The judiciary act was changed and jurisdiction given during the war and since the war. In many respects I think it was wrong policy to have given the jurisdiction which was given; but those who acted upon that subject were wise in their day and generation, and I may be wrong and they may be right; but I am unwilling now to take up in an immature condition and decide upon that subject in this bill. It needs thorough investigation. The whole subject must be taken all in. It needs the thorough investigation of a competent committee after having heard all the arguments upon it and considered it fully. No committee has decided the question of jurisdiction. It is unusual to introduce a question involving the jurisdiction of courts in a bill that has no other object than the creation of courts. That is the reason I am opposed to this amendment.

There are some portions of it that I should vote for cheerfully and willingly, if introduced as a separate measure; and I know that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has had his attention attracted to this subject, and after action is taken on this bill, as he told the Senator from Arkansas and myself, he will be ready to consider this subject. We have considered it in relation to national banks, we have been considering it in relation to railroad corporations that are created in one State and do business in another. Those who are opposed to the bill, I can see well enough, may seek to have this thing interpolated in the bill; but ought those who are really friendly to the bill do it?

Mr. President, if this bill now fails here, that is the end of any relief to the Supreme Court, or an end to any relief for the evils complained of, for the next three or four years, till after the next Presidential election in any case. If this bill does not pass at the present session of Congress I do not think any bill will pass until after the next Presidential election.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, when the Senator from Alabama made his motion I supposed he made it in good faith, for the purpose of obtaining information, and I rose to say that I would be glad to vote for it for the same purpose. When the Senator from Illinois chooses to say it is a pretense merely, I beg leave to differ with him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Kentucky did not urge any reason but that he wanted to learn what these gentlemen knew on this question. Now, I advise him that they do not discuss this question at all.

Mr. BECK. How does the Senator from Illinois know what information the Senator from Alabama, or myself, or anybody else can obtain from these distinguished gentlemen? They are competent to consider other things besides the report that was looked over after dinner at Saratoga. Their capacity was not exhausted by that occasion, I presume, but they have the power and have the ability to give information that may be valuable.

I am one of those who believe that before a court of eighteen new judges is to be established, the question of jurisdiction is a very proper question to be determined, because, if the jurisdiction is to be curtailed, as the Senator from Illinois thinks in many respects it ought to be, a smaller court than eighteen would be sufficient to act under that curtailed jurisdiction. And if many of these laws were improperly passed, or if the occasion for them has passed away, and they can be modified or repealed so as properly to curtail the jurisdiction, then the court that is now proposed under the existing condition of the laws may be greatly modified and the necessity for the services of additional judges greatly diminished when proper legislation is had touching that question of jurisdiction which is brought up so sharply by the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am informed that a committee consisting perhaps of seven or eight or nine was selected by the American Bar Association to take into consideration this whole subject, that they have been laboriously engaged upon it for a long time. The names of the committeemen who have come to my attention impressed me with the opinion that they were about as able as any of the jurists in the United States, whether they have been on the Supreme bench or not; as the name, for instance, of Mr. Edward J. Phelps or Mr. William M. Evarts, to say nothing of other gentlemen as Judge Hitchcock, of Missouri, and Judge Bradley, of Rhode Island. Now, it is asserted by the Senator from Illinois, who seems to be better informed about this than I am, that the committee is divided equally.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. So Mr. Hitchcock told me the other day.

Mr. MORGAN. The committee is equally divided, he says. I have as much interest in knowing what Mr. Hitchcock's opinion is, and the gentlemen who coincide with him in opinion, as I have in knowing the opinion of the other side, for as I stated, as far as I have heard the opinions on the other side they are in consonance with the view I expressed to the Senate the other day as to our power to divide the Supreme Court into sections. I desire therefore to hear from both sides. The Senator from Illinois seems to think that that is a pretense of mine to delay action on this bill. I regret very much——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I said that it was a pretense of the Senator from Kentucky from the argument that I had heard in relation to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. I did not say anything about the Senator from Alabama using it as a pretense. I withdraw that remark, however, because it was not a proper remark to use here. The Senator from Kentucky argued about the amendment all the time, and did not say one word about what these gentlemen did, and I told the Senator that these gentleman did not speak on the question of the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, suppose I should be rude enough to say that I thought the Senator from Illinois was afraid to have this argument printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have no fear about it.

Mr. MORGAN. Would he not think that was a very rude speech? And yet we should have the same right to draw that inference against the Senator that he has to draw that inference against the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I withdrew the word "pretense."

Mr. MORGAN. I know it is withdrawn, and I withdraw what I said about the other suggestion. [Laughter.] So we are even about that.

But this is a question of too much gravity to be forced through in a hurry. I may not have the capacity to understand it rightly as I should. It is a very great question, and there are some views of it that very strongly impress themselves upon my mind. The first one I took occasion to express the other day in opening some remarks to the Senate, that the best way to get rid of the difficulty of the accumulation of business in the Federal courts, whether in the inferior courts or in the Supreme Court, was to reduce the jurisdiction, relegate back to the States those questions which have been taken from the States either by Congressional action or by judicial usurpation. I think there have been two very broad fields of jurisdiction carved out of the jurisdiction intended by our fathers to belong to the State courts simply by judicial usurpation. Whoever attended to the argument of the honorable Senator from Arkansas to-day must be satisfied not merely that he was able to defend that proposition, but that he had the support of some of the brightest intellects that have ever sat on the Supreme Court Bench of the United States that in respect to the citizenship of corporations, which has drawn into the Federal courts and into the Supreme Court of the United States a very large mass of unnecessary litigation, the decision made upon which that usurpation of jurisdiction was based was one that will not stand the test of the common-sense of this country. And so in respect of the other assumption of jurisdiction which has caused this country so much of evil already; that is attempting to enforce through a writ of mandamus, which the Supreme Court decides is not an original power of the circuit court but a mere collateral or incidental power, an authority against State officers which tends to the breaking up of State governments, which in my own State incarcerated a judge of probate—one of the most important officers in that State, having the broadest jurisdiction and the most useful to the people at large—from the middle of November until the last part of the month of January, on a void order of a judge of the circuit court of the United States.

These things are not to be passed by without some consideration; and if the honorable Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate have considered them and have not reported a bill to remedy them when it is admitted on all hands that the evils exist and demand remedy, why should that committee undertake to bring a bill forward for the purpose of accommodating our judicial functions and our judicial machinery to an immense broad field of jurisdiction when they themselves admit that that jurisdiction has been wrongly usurped and ought to be cut down? I am not in favor of inventing more machinery and machinery of larger capacity for the decision of causes in the Federal courts, whether the Supreme Court or inferior courts, to accommodate a jurisdiction that has been usurped by those courts, and which we ourselves owe it as a duty to the country that we should curtail. Hence I think that the proposition to curtail the jurisdiction comes naturally and necessarily first.

If we want to serve the people of the United States rather than some political party, if we want to save the people the sum of $500,000 a year in expense, instead of putting it in the power of your President to appoint eighteen judges, and perhaps nine more marshals, and nine more clerks, and the like, we had better devote our attention to the curtailing of the jurisdiction which has been thus unlawfully usurped by these courts, rather than in providing machinery for the accommodation and for the administration of that unlawfully widespread jurisdiction.

Now, sir, this is not a question that can pass from my mind at least without serious consideration. Very few Senators have participated in this debate on the other side of this Chamber, I have noticed; not because these questions are not interesting; not because they do not understand them, for they comprehend them as well as Senators on this side, but they remain silent except to help the organization up, to keep the question in compact form, so that they may lay their hand to the President of the United States with a majority in this body upon eighteen men selected from the Republican party to administer—what? Justice, not according to law, but according to party behests.

That is going to be the fruit of it. We are to judge a tree by its fruits. We understand exactly what this tree will produce. I understand the bitterness of it. I understand the gall and the wormwood that comes out of this production. The honorable Senator from Illinois must not suppose that either by taunts or otherwise he can silence the voice of a man who wants to speak for the people of this country in opposition to a bill even that the honorable Committee on the Judiciary may have brought forward.

When you come to the verbiage of this bill, those who have legal acumen and understand the meaning of words will probably find some of the most important lawsuits couched in the very language of the bill itself; not that I claim to be a critic, but with an eye unskilled as mine I can see holes in it that you could drive a six-horse team through, it seems to me, in matters of construction. The bill is to be hurried through; it is to be put upon its passage whether or no; and while, as has been remarked here, we are searching the world over with commissions upon whisky to get the evidence about drunkenness in the country, commissions upon the tariff to find out how much the people are taxed, how much they ought to be taxed, and in what way they should be taxed, commissions on woman suffrage, and such things as those, we cannot afford to stop for two days to find out the opinion of men who have been engaged in questions of this kind for months and months together.

Mr. President, I have made this motion in good faith; the Senate can dispose of it as they see proper to do; but it is my opinion that the wish to pass the bill before the American Bar Association can get their opinions before the country smacks more of a desire to avoid the discussion which they will bring forward than it does of haste, or intemperance, or impertinence on our side in trying to get the benefit of such testimony.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust the Senator from Illinois will not antagonize the proposition of the Senator from Alabama. I do not see what harm or injury can befall this bill by waiting——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator let me interrupt him?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is no expectation of disposing of the bill finally to-day. Why not let the discussion go on next Monday for a reasonable length of time, and if there is then any wish to postpone it until the day following, well and good; but I do not want the bill to go over until Tuesday. There are two or three Senators who desire to address the Senate on the pending amendment, and we can certainly come to a vote upon this question, with which the views of the bar association have nothing to do on earth.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then if Senators will yield now, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from Indiana withhold his motion a moment for the consideration of a bill to which there is no objection in order to accommodate my colleague.

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 835. It will take but a very few moments to dispose of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending bill will be informally laid aside, if there is no objection. The Chair hears none.

FORT NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 835) to open to settlement and entry certain lands in the State of Nebraska, withdrawn by executive order for military purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, directed to restore to the Secretary of the Interior the custody, control, and disposition of the following-described parcels and tracts of land embraced within the limits of the Fort Niobrara military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, as declared in executive order of December 10, 1879, and enlarged by executive order of June 6, 1881, to wit: all of sections numbered 29, 30, 31, and 32, and the west half of section numbered 33, all in township numbered 34 north, of range numbered 27 west, and all that part of section numbered 8, in township numbered 33 north, of range numbered 27 west, within the said limits of said reservation.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall dispose of said tracts and parcels of land under the public-land laws in the same manner as if said tracts and parcels had never been embraced within the limits of said military reservation; and such persons as have settled or made improvements thereon prior to December 10, 1881, shall have priority of claim thereto under the public-land laws: Provided, That they file their respective claims according to law at the proper land-office within three months after the said lands become subject to disposition under the public-land laws.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

Mr. VOORHEES. If this matter is going to occupy time, as it seems it will, I must insist on my motion.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It will not occupy any time. It was reported unanimously from the Military Committee.

Mr. INGALLS. We might as well understand this in advance. Here is a military reservation in Nebraska, on which unauthorized settlements have been made by trespassers as if it were public land, and this is an attempt——

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg the Senator's pardon; his statement is without foundation of fact.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us go on with the report, then; I may have been misinformed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has not yet been taken up. Is there objection to taking up the bill for consideration at this time?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The report will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. COCKRELL April 4:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill 835, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

Your committee referred said bill to the Secretary of War for information and report, and received from him the following letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 30, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo, referring, for the views of this Department thereon, Senate bill 835, to open to settlement and entry certain lands in Nebraska, supposed to have been included in the military reservation of Fort Niobrara.

In reply thereto I inclose herewith a report from the Adjutant-General on the subject, dated the 25th instant, and beg to state that there is no objection on the part of this Department to releasing sections 29, 30, 31, 32, and the west half of section 33, in township 34 north, range 27 west, and all that portion of section 8 in township 33 north, range 27 west, included within the limits of the Fort Niobrara military reservation, declared in Executive order of December 10, 1879, and enlarged by Executive order of June 6, 1881.

With the exception of the above-mentioned sections, no portion of the Fort Niobrara military reservation can be given up without detriment to the military service.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL, of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

From this letter of the Secretary of War it is clearly apparent that the portions of said military reservation described therein are of no possible use for military purposes, and should be at once restored to the public domain for disposition by the Secretary of the Interior under the general laws.

Some citizens of the United States prior to December 10, 1881, settled and made improvements on certain portions of said tracts, not needed for military purposes, and in the disposition thereof should have priority of claim thereto.

Your committee have prepared and herewith submit as a substitute for and in lieu of said Senate bill No. 835, a bill to restore those portions of said reservation described in said letter of the Secretary of War as of no use for military purposes to the public domain for disposition by the Secretary of the Interior under the general land laws, giving priority of right to such persons as have settled or made improvements thereon prior to December 10, 1881, provided they file their claims within three months after said lands are subject to disposition, and recommend the passage thereof.

Mr. INGALLS. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that all these rights had accrued before the military reservation was established?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; the old military reservation was established, as the record which has been read shows, some time ago. Recently, the reservation was extended very largely so as to take in an immense area of country. These parties went and settled not upon the old reservation, but upon the portion that was included within the new reservation, before they knew that the reservation had been made.

Mr. INGALLS. Did they settle on the reservation before or after it was legally established?

Mr. COCKRELL. Some of them settled before and some of them after it was legally established, but before they had knowledge of it.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the question of knowledge affect the question of right?

Mr. COCKRELL. Nobody else is claiming it. It is an immense prairie country. Persons have gone there and settled upon the land; they have built their little houses. The reservation was extended so as to embrace that portion of the country, but I suppose there will be no controversy at all in regard to it. As I understand, it has been the universal rule after persons have settled in good faith upon land in that way and it was not extraordinarily valuable or anything of that kind, when they settled innocently, to give them the priority of perfecting their title to it; and for that very reason priority is given to these parties as a matter of simple justice and right.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the reservation abandoned?

Mr. COCKRELL. The reservation is not abandoned. We only give up precisely what the Secretary of War says the Government has no use for and that portion which was covered by the extension of the reservation.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let me say one word to the Senator from Kansas. As has been stated, the original reservation was largely extended and for the purpose of securing the timber, but in extending the lines of the reservation they took in, as has been stated by the Senator from Missouri, a very large extent of country, including the upland prairie, which was not required for any purpose by the Government.

The only object of the Government—and it was so proclaimed in the act and so publicly understood—was to draw a sufficient amount for timber purposes. Therefore it was reserved; but persons located upon this high level upland territory, to which they did not suppose at the time, neither did the general public suppose at the time, that the Government sought to attach any claim, as the Government was only seeking to extend a timber reservation.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw any objection I made to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended, so as to read: "A bill to restore certain portions of the Fort Niobrara military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, to the public domain, and for other purposes."

C. D. DE FORD & CO.

Mr. VOORHEES rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VOORHEES. Upon the suggestion of others about me I will withdraw that motion and move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GROOME. Will the Senator allow me to ask consent to take up a bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, of course; I never refuse anything.

Mr. GROOME. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1513) for the relief of Orville Horwitz, trustee for C. D. De Ford & Co.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

Mr. HARRIS. I can perhaps state the points of the report in a manner that will save time and be satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. The report had better be read. These matters are important as precedents.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly the Senator shall have the privilege of hearing the report if he desires. The report contains all that I intended to say and more.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRIS April 11:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1513) for the relief of Orville Horwitz, trustee for C. D. De Ford & Co., having considered the same, submit the following report:

When the act of July 20, 1868, was passed, George T. De Ford and William Y. De Ford were tobacco merchants in the city of Baltimore, Maryland, trading under the firm name of C. D. De Ford & Co., and had on hand at that time a large stock of manufactured tobacco and cigars, upon which all taxes imposed under the laws as they then existed had been fully paid.

But the ninety-fourth section of that act required that all tobacco and cigars manufactured prior to the passage of the act, and remaining unsold on the 1st day of April, 1869, should have tax-paid stamps affixed to the packages before being sold, or offered for sale, even though a tax had been paid on the same under the provisions of former laws.

On the 1st day of April, 1869, the said firm had on hand a large lot of cigars unsold, but upon which all taxes required by laws prior to the act of July 20, 1868, had been fully paid, and shortly after that date the said firm of C. D. De Ford & Co., in order to put a portion of these cigars on the market, under protest, purchased tax-paid stamps of the collector of internal revenue at Baltimore, amounting to $1,347.25.

Soon thereafter said firm conveyed its property and assets to the claimant, Orville Horwitz, in trust for the benefit of its creditors. When the said trustee took possession of the stock he found a large lot of cigars on hand upon which it is alleged that all taxes had been paid prior to the passage of the act of July 20, 1868; but in order to put them upon the market he was compelled to purchase from the collector tax-paid stamps to the amount of $3,306.50.

The committee referred the bill to the Secretary of the Treasury with the request that he give the committee such information on the subject as the records of the Department could furnish, with such suggestions as he might see fit to make.

In answer the Secretary forwarded to the committee the following statements from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the collector at Baltimore:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 8, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 21st ultimo, inclosing bill (S. No. 1513) for the relief of O. Horwitz, &c., and asking for information and suggestions in regard to the same, I have the honor to inclose herewith the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the 6th instant, and accompanying papers, giving a history of the claim.

In addition to what is therein stated, I suggest that the bill should be amended so as to require proof that the tax had been previously paid on the cigars, by inserting in line 12 of the bill, after the words "upon which," the following words: "he or they shall prove to the satisfaction of said Commissioner that."

Very respectfully,

CHARLES J. FOLGER,
Secretary.

Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 6, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill 1513 "for the relief of Orville Horwitz, trustee for C. D. De Ford & Co.," and the letter of Hon. Isham G. Harris, of Subcommittee of Finance, of the 21st ultimo, to you, which you referred to this office on the 23d ultimo, for my opinion upon the merits of the bill, and such information as the files of this office furnish.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be "directed to pay to Orville Horwitz, assignee in trust of William Y. De Ford and George T. De Ford, copartner, trading as C. D. De Ford & Co., the sum of $4,653.75, or so much thereof as the said trustee shall prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he or the said firm have expended in the purchase of revenue-stamps used by him or them to stamp packages containing cigars upon which a tax had been previously paid under the revenue laws in force at the time of manufacture and sale, but which were made liable to be stamped under the act of July 20, 1868.

The tax on all cigars was required by that act to be paid by stamps. All cigars manufactured prior to the passage of the act, and remaining unsold on the 1st day of April, 1869, were required to have the tax-paid stamps affixed before being sold or offered for sale, although a tax may have been already paid on the same, under the provisions of former laws. (Sec. 94, 15 Stat., 164.)

Messrs. C. D. De Ford & Co. were dealers in tobacco and cigars, in Baltimore, and had on hand a large stock of cigars, upon which they allege the tax had been paid under the provisions of law existing prior to the passage of the act of July 20, 1868.

A large portion of their old and unstamped stock remained on hand April 1, 1869, and under the provisions of the new law they were obliged to purchase stamps and affix the same to the boxes containing said cigars.

The case appears similar to that of Messrs. Hibben & Co. and R. Loewenthal, of Chicago, for whose relief acts were passed in 1876, and also to that of James E. Montell, of Baltimore, respecting which I addressed you December 31, 1881.

A bill for relief has recently passed Congress in the similar case of Rosenfeld & Co.

A copy of a report relative to the case of C. D. De Ford & Co., from R. M. Proud, esq., collector third district Baltimore, Maryland, dated the 1st instant, is inclosed.

It seems just and equitable to give these parties the same relief that has been afforded others similarly situated.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM,
Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

OFFICE COLLECTOR INTERNAL REVENUE,
THIRD DISTRICT MARYLAND,
Baltimore, April 1, 1882.

Respectfully returned to the honorable Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Washington, with the following information:

At the time of the passage of the act of July 20, 1868, imposing taxes on distilled spirits, tobacco, &c., Messrs. C. D. De Ford & Co. were dealers in tobacco and cigars in this city, and had on hand a large stock of cigars upon which the tax had been paid under the provisions of law existing prior to the passage of that act, which act changes the mode of collecting the tax on cigars, requiring the boxes containing them to have stamps affixed thereto denoting the tax-paid cigars, the tax on which had been paid under the provisions of former acts, were allowed to be sold unstamped until the 1st day of April, 1869, after which date, by the terms of section 94, all cigars of every description were to be taken to have been either manufactured or imported after the passage of said act, and should be stamped accordingly. Messrs. De Ford & Co. made monthly inventories as required by section 94, and on April 1, 1869, still had on hand a large portion of their old unstamped stock which they had been unable to dispose of, and upon which they were afterward obliged to pay the tax a second time by purchasing stamps to be affixed to the boxes under the provisions of the new law.

Mr. R. M. Smith, my immediate predecessor, was collector of this district at that time, and when making such purchases of stamps from him Messrs. De Ford & Co. were in the habit of making formal protests against the second payment required. A copy of one of those protests now on the files of this office and a copy of one of the monthly inventories of Messrs. De Ford & Co. are transmitted herewith, marked respectively A and B.

The members of the firm of C. D. De Ford & Co. stand high in this community as men of integrity and of strict honesty in their business dealings.

R. M. PROUD, Collector.

NO. 37 SOUTH GAY STREET,
Baltimore, December 30, 1869.

DEAR SIR: We hereby protest against the payment of $50 this day paid to you for stamps to be applied to packages containing cigars which have already paid the tax required by the laws of Congress imposing the same, believing as we do that the exaction of a second tax upon the same cigars is unconstitutional and in violation of every principle of right and justice.

We remain, very respectfully,

CHAS. D. DE FORD & CO.

ROBERT M. SMITH, Esq.,
Collector Internal Revenue, District of Maryland, Baltimore.

I hereby certify that I examined the several items herein stated, and found them correct.

J. E. LAMB, A. A.

December 1, 1868.

In view of the facts stated by the Commissioner and collector the committee recommend that the bill be amended as suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that it pass.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no further objection to the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, in line 12, after the word "which," to insert "he or they shall prove to the satisfaction of said commissioner that;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Orville Horwitz, assignee in trust of William Y. De Ford and George T. De Ford, copartners, trading as C. D. De Ford & Co., the sum of $4,653.75, or so much thereof as the said trustee shall prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he or the said firm have expended in the purchase of revenue-stamps used by him or them to stamp packages containing cigars upon which he or they shall prove to the satisfaction of said Commissioner that a tax had been previously paid under the revenue laws in force at the time of manufacture and sale, but which were made liable to be stamped under the act of July 20, 1868.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIO GRANDE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. COKE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. No. 1620) to authorize the construction of a street-railway and wagon-road bridge over the Rio Grande River, between the city of El Paso, Texas, and Paso del Norte, Mexico. It is a very short bill and will produce no discussion.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, at the end of section 1, to add "which charge shall be subject to revision and regulation by the Secretary of War from time to time;" so as to make the section read:

That the El Paso Street Railway Company, a corporation organized and created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Texas, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to construct, own, maintain, and operate a street-railway bridge over the Rio Grande River between the city of El Paso, in the State of Texas, and the city of Paso del Norte, in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, at such point as may be most convenient to said corporation to unite and connect the street railroad to be constructed by them in the said city of El Paso with any street railroad that may be constructed by any person or company in the said city of Paso del Norte, and to build and lay on and across said bridge ways for the passage of animals, foot passengers, and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of which said corporation may charge a reasonable toll, which charge shall be subject to revision and regulation by the Secretary of War from time to time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is it not a very singular clause to provide that the Secretary of War shall be charged with the duty of revising the tolls imposed by a private corporation in the State of Texas? It seems to me that that is imposing upon the Secretary of War a novel duty, at any rate, and one that I apprehend does not pertain to his office as Secretary of War.

Mr. COKE. I would suggest to the Senator from Delaware that this bridge is to be built across a river which is a national boundary, and that the Texas company will co-operate with the Mexican company in building it. There should be some authority having the power to supervise the rates of toll and charges for crossing the bridge, and the committee thought that the Secretary of War would be as good as any other. It is a very common provision, I think.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is done in all such cases.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Texas inform us if the river is navigable at the point where this bridge is proposed to cross?

Mr. COKE. The river is not navigable there.

Mr. INGALLS. Then what is the necessity of invoking the action of Congress on the subject?

Mr. COKE. The necessity exists because the river is a national boundary, and the Texas company which proposes to build this bridge will co-operate with a Mexican company, chartered under Mexican authority, on the other side of the river. It was supposed, as the river had been the subject of treaty between the Republic of Mexico and this country, that when it was crossed it would be better that the assent of the national Government should be had. Indeed it is one of the requirements of the charter granted to the Mexican company that this Government shall give its consent to the building of the bridge, so far as the Texas company is concerned.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that the fact that one terminus of this bridge is on foreign soil would not render it necessary that consent should be given by the United States Government to build a bridge across the river unless it is navigable.

Mr. COKE. The river is not navigable at that point, but if the Senator will reflect for a moment he will see that as this is a boundary between the United States and Mexico——

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; but the fact that it is a boundary is no more than if it were an imaginary line run by surveyors.

Mr. COKE. The Senator will remember, however, that the center of the Rio Grande River is the boundary line between the Republics of the United States and Mexico, and that the treaty stipulations provide that there shall be no obstruction of the navigation of that river. While this point is above navigation it does not seem that any citizen or any company could assume, without the consent of Congress, that it is not navigable and build bridges that might obstruct the river if at any time it should turn out that it was navigable.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a navigable stream, but the bridge is to be built at a point above what is now navigable.

Mr. COKE. It is really navigable, but it is navigable much lower down than this point. This point is above the head of present navigation.

Mr. INGALLS. It is several hundred miles above, I understand.

Mr. COKE. I suppose it is four hundred or five hundred miles above.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the terms of the bill are insensible, because it is stipulated that the span shall be so constructed as not to interfere with navigation. That is an absurdity. If there is no navigation why should the requirement be inserted that the bridge shall be so constructed as not to interfere with navigation?

Mr. COKE. It is not used now for any navigable purposes. It is not, in the general and usual practical sense, navigable, but I presume there are seasons of the year when there is water enough in the river there for navigation.

Mr. INGALLS. That would be true of Pennsylvania avenue. We have occasionally seen that enough under water to float boats.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment was read.

Mr. INGALLS. If the theory on which this bill is based is that it is an international structure, and that the assent of the Mexican Government is necessary to have it builded, how can we provide that the Secretary of War of the United States Government shall regulate the tolls over it?

Mr. BUTLER. He can regulate the tolls on this side of the river, certainly.

Mr. COKE. So far as the jurisdiction of this Government extends.

Mr. INGALLS. So far as our country goes; that is, to the middle of the stream?

Mr. COKE. So far as our country goes. The bridge is to be built by two companies, one organized under the laws of Texas and the other under the laws of Mexico, and the company cannot commence operations under the Mexican charter until the consent of the national Government of the United States is given.

Mr. BUTLER. We regulate the Indians sometimes on the other side of the international line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 4, before the word "water," to insert "high;" so as to read:

That said bridge may be built with unbroken and continuous spans, and of the following dimensions, to wit: Six hundred feet in length, twenty feet in width, ten feet in height above high-water level, and with twenty-eight spans, twelve of which to be thirty feet in length and sixteen of which to be fifteen feet in length; that said bridge when completed in the manner herein specified shall be deemed and taken to be a legal structure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 18, after the word "bridge," to insert "or for any other reason;" so as to read:

That Congress reserves the right to withdraw the authority and power conferred by this act in case the free navigation of said river shall at any time be substantially or materially obstructed by said bridge, or for any other reason, and to direct the removal or necessary modifications thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the bill, to add:

At the cost and expense of the owners of said bridge; and Congress may at any time alter, repeal, or amend this act: And provided further, That the consent of the Mexican State of Chihuahua and of the proper authorities of the Republic of Mexico shall have been obtained before said bridge shall be built or commenced.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT IN MEMPHIS.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1703) to cede to the first taxing district of the State of Tennessee a certain lot of land situated in said State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know anything about the bill, but I trust the Senator will let it go over so that we may adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. If it takes any time I will consent that it may go over; but I do not think it will take five minutes, and, as a question of time, if the bill is to pass it is important that it should be passed at once.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will consent that it be proceeded with, reserving the right to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have a motion pending to adjourn. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 11, after the word "successors," to insert:

And if the said trustees shall find that the said lot is not suitable for the purpose of a public-library building, then the same may be sold and conveyed by the said taxing district, and the proceeds of such sale reinvested in a lot suitable for such building, which shall be held in trust as aforesaid;

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the lot or parcel of ground situated on the southeast corner of Jefferson and Third streets in the city of Memphis, in the first taxing district of the State of Tennessee, now owned by the Government of the United States, and upon which it was formerly intended to erect a post-office, custom-house, and United States district and circuit court-rooms, be, and the same is hereby, ceded to the first taxing district of Tennessee, to be held in trust for the use of the board of trustees of said public library and their successors; and if the said trustees shall find that the said lot is not suitable for the purpose of a public-library building, then the same may be sold and conveyed by the said taxing district and the proceeds of such sale reinvested in a lot suitable for such building, which shall be held in trust as aforesaid; and if the said board of trustees shall fail to erect a suitable building for a public library upon said lot within three years from the passage of this act, then said lot shall be held in trust by said taxing district for the use and benefit of the public schools of said taxing district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear some statement of the facts in regard to this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state the facts in brief. A number of years ago a lot 148 feet square in the city of Memphis was purchased as the site for a custom-house, court-house, and post-office. The house was not built, and I believe the original appropriation, after the purchase of the lot, lapsed. Some five or six years ago an appropriation was made for the purchase of a site and the construction of a building for a custom-house, court-house, and post-office in the city of Memphis. This lot, having been perhaps ten years previously purchased, was found wholly unsuited.

In the first place it was not sufficiently large; in the second place it was not sufficiently centrally located, the building up and population and business of the city having floated to the south and east. Therefore a new site had to be procured. In endeavoring to procure a new site it was found difficult to get one that could be obtained on what were thought to be fair and reasonable terms. The city of Memphis donated a lot three hundred and fifty feet square, in the very heart of the business of the city, a lot that I am quite satisfied I can safely say is worth twenty, perhaps fifty, times as much as the lot in question.

Mr. HOAR. Why is not the lot granted to the city of Memphis?

Mr. HARRIS. Because the name of the locality and people is changed, the act of incorporation having been repealed, and the same territory, or about the same territory, incorporated under the present name.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any city of Memphis now?

Mr. HARRIS. There is not.

Mr. ALLISON. What is it?

Mr. HARRIS. It is the first taxing district of the State of Tennessee.

The city having given to the Government this three hundred and fifty-feet lot, according to the representation of my late colleague in the House who had the management of the matter, with the understanding that it was to be exchanged for the smaller lot, this bill proceeds upon the idea that the Government ought to cede to that people this lot. The present necessity is that a large donation has been offered for the establishment of a public library, on condition that the taxing district will furnish a lot and build a suitable building, and we want to utilize this lot for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Finance proposed to amend the preamble by striking out the following clause:

> Whereas said last-mentioned lot owned by the United States is centrally located and admirably situated for the purpose of a public library.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty-nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 5, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2415) to fix the term of office of collectors of internal revenue, and that the same be considered in the House at this time. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means, and is recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. KASSON. I am obliged——

Mr. DUNNELL. Hear the bill read.

Mr. KASSON. I am obliged, under the promise made, to object to any business being done at this time in order that we may finish the programme to-day in reference to the debate on the tariff-commission bill.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. KASSON. I therefore move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. ATKINS. I would inquire of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] if he expects to get a vote to-day on the tariff-commission bill?

Mr. KASSON. That depends upon the gentlemen who are to speak.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How many are to speak?

Mr. KASSON. There are three who are to speak to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. A number of gentlemen wish to know if there is to be a vote to-day.

Mr. KASSON. There may be a vote this afternoon on the amendments to the bill, if there is time enough. I wish to lose no time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think it had better be understood whether there will be a vote to-day.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. The probabilities are that some amendments may be voted on in Committee of the Whole at four o'clock to-day. I understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] reserves his final hour for debate until the bill is reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to dispense with the morning hour for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. As it is very apparent that there will be no vote to-day, I think it had better be understood at the start.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; we do not want to waste any of to-day.

ILLINOIS AND MISSISSIPPI CANAL.

Mr. FARWELL, of Iowa, asked and obtained consent to have printed in the RECORD as a portion of the debates of the House some remarks which he had prepared on the bill (H. R. No. 2248) providing for the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi Canal. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts in the chair.

TARIFF-COMMISSION.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2315) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws. Upon this bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose in this debate to be as brief and practical in the expression of my views as possible, preferring, for obvious reasons, the postponement of all general discussion of details of necessary legislation until the revision of the present tariff shall be directly under consideration. It is a subject at all times, and in every country, full of difficulty and embarrassment, and yet it is as old as government itself, and has exhausted, as we know, the highest mental efforts of the most celebrated statesmen. Some few points have been settled and accepted generally, but they are not many. Hallam, the justly esteemed constitutional historian, in his "Europe During the Middle Ages," lays down this axiom, which our experience as a people justifies and which will not be disputed:

> It is difficult to name a limit beyond which taxes will not be borne without impatience when they appear to be called for by necessity and faithfully applied; nor is it impracticable for a skillful minister to deceive the people in both these respects. But the sting of taxation is wastefulness. What high-spirited man could see without indignation the earnings of his labor, yielded ungrudgingly to the public defense, become the spoil of parasites and peculators? It is this that mortifies the liberal hand of public spirit; and those statesmen who deem the security of government to depend not on laws and armies, but on the moral sympathies and prejudices of the people, will vigilantly guard against even the suspicion of prodigality.

It is equally true that excessive taxation, even when it is successful in securing excessive revenue, is ultimately destructive of the sources of labor from which it is drawn; while at the same time it engenders extravagance, corruption, and decay. For when the Government sets the example of extravagance, it is soon followed in every walk of life, and one does not need to be a prophet to foretell the general ruin which must inevitably result. Frugality and economy never destroyed any government, while they have built up the most powerful empires the world has ever witnessed.

So much for general statement. Revenue laws have been a subject of discussion, agitation, and anxiety from the earliest days of our political history. Indeed, Sabine, in his "Loyalists of the American Revolution," states positively his convictions after careful study of documentary history and state papers that they "teach nothing more clearly than this, namely, that almost every matter brought into discussion was practical, and in some form or other related to labor, to some branch of common industry." He states further on there were no less than twenty-nine laws which restricted and bound down colonial industry.

The manner of raising the necessary revenue for the support of the Government has been, as I have said, at all times in the United States the cause of irritation to the people. And we need not be surprised at this, when we consider the vast extent of our domain, and the almost endless diversity of productions of the soil, and of manufactures, and every branch of human industry.

The existing overflowing Treasury brings a demand for reduction of the tariff and internal-revenue taxes. In my opinion, in such a condition of our finances reduction of taxation should at once begin. Unnecessary taxation is injurious to the interests of the people in many directions. Government has no justification for the collection of burdensome taxes in excess of the sum requisite for the support of its proper administration. What have we seen in this Congress? The excess of our resources has induced the presentation of every conceivable scheme to deplete the Treasury, and our expenditures, unless checked in time, will reach enormous proportions and bring back again, as prior to 1874, a saturnalia of extravagance and disgrace.

In the matter of taxation we are acting under a written Constitution. "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." I need not enlarge upon our traditional history in this regard, and it will be accepted as true that only at periods of great necessity and urgency have excise or internal taxes been resorted to. Our present internal-revenue system grew up out of the necessities of the war, and when those necessities cease that taxation should disappear. When the framers of the Constitution granted the power to impose excise duties it was a point of serious dispute and was agreed to finally only as a resort in case the Government should be involved in war, and not to be exercised as a permanent mode of raising revenue.

I will not enlarge upon this; I believe it to be incontrovertible, however men may change sides because of other considerations affecting other questions; and I do not forget that Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence and the founder of the Democratic party, brought about the repeal of internal or excise taxes as one of the very first acts of his administration as President of the United States.

I favor, therefore, as speedily as possible, a total abolition of our internal-revenue system, and I am ready to join hands with any and all in this House in favor of an equalization of our duties on imports. No one who understands the existing tariff laws will deny the justice and necessity of revision. The present duties were for the most part levied during war and for the purpose of raising a large war revenue. It will suffice in this connection to quote the Industrial League as unanswerable in this regard, as it is an admission on the part of those who favor the highest protective duties:

> They consider such revision desirable for the interests both of the industries affected and those of consumers, partly on account of some original imperfections in the present tariff, and partly on account of the modifications which are demanded by the changes which have occurred in conditions of production and commerce.

There should be, however, no vicious assault on these laws. Changes should have a firm foundation in reason, and especially should we avoid mere experimental and purely speculative efforts on this vital subject. Our excess of revenue now approaches in amount the annual receipts from internal or excise taxes. If proper economy be exercised in expenditures they can be made to be within the limits of our ordinary resources of taxation, enabling us without jar or friction to repeal internal-tax laws, which are inquisitorial and offensive in the highest degree. These taxes reach vexatiously every citizen in his business, in his household, and in the affairs of everyday life until they have become almost unendurable. There is no longer an excuse, in my opinion, for their continuance.

The objection to direct taxes is equally strong to internal taxes; and either or both are justified only by stern necessity. They are irritating and dangerous, and internal-revenue taxes entail upon us the keeping up, as at present, somewhere near five thousand officers engaged in their collection, distributed in every county of every State, tainting, as we know, the source of all power in this Republic, the elections of the people. Who favors direct tax? No one; and if the internal taxes were not now imposed by law, is there a man who would risk his political future by asking that the system should be put into operation? I sincerely believe that there is not a man.

I did hope when this Congress assembled that before the adjournment of this session a very large reduction of internal taxation would have resulted from our labors. The Committee on Ways and Means seemed to favor a reduction of $70,000,000, but the fiat of a Republican Congressional caucus overruled that good intent. Thus the majority of the Representatives in this House of one political party, and of a party representing a doubtful majority of the people even at the time of its election, regulates the current of remedial legislation, and in this instance on a subject which should be non-partisan. Thus the opportunity of relieving our tax-annoyed and tax-burdened constituents may be lost.

The reduction as now recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means reaches in great part those most able to pay, leaving the great body of consumers without relief. How long the latter will permit this state of things to continue will probably be determined at our next Congressional elections. With the repeal of internal or excise taxes will come a resort exclusively to duties on imports as the main supply of our resources, and I maintain if our expenditures be kept within just and reasonable bounds we can from this source derive adequate revenue for the administration of the Government in all its constitutional and legitimate functions.

The estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, of the amount to be raised from duties on imports is $217,000,000, and from all other sources, leaving out internal taxes, $30,000,000; so that the total abolition of excise taxes would still leave to the Government in the neighborhood of $250,000,000.

It must be recollected, however, that while our current annual payment of interest on the public debt has been reduced to $61,000,000, (which will continue to decrease,) yet there will be a greater increase in liabilities on account of pensions. Taking the years ending June 30, 1877 and 1878, as a criterion, this amount of receipts would still, with prudence and frugality, leave a sufficient revenue. Let me recapitulate: the net ordinary expenditures for year ending June 30, 1877, $144,209,963.28; the net ordinary expenditures for year ending June 30, 1878, $134,463,452.15. In the latter year no appropriations were made for rivers and harbors. The amount of appropriations for these objects for the former year was about $5,000,000, so that a fair average of the net ordinary expenses based on these two years would be $142,000,000. Let us to this amount add on account of interest $61,000,000, and for sinking fund about $45,000,000 per annum, a sum which I deem sufficient in amount each year toward liquidation of the aggregate amount of the debt, and we have a gross sum of expenditure of $248,000,000.

There will equitably stand to the credit of the sinking fund for the year ending June 30, 1883, taking the bonds already called for payment up to July 1, 1882, $40,423,700. The sinking fund for the current fiscal year and arrearages for prior years were fully provided for by calls which matured March 13 last and prior to that date. The bonds in calls maturing from that date to June 30 next are not applied to the sinking fund, because it is full. While the bonds included in calls maturing from March 13 to June 30, being calls 108 to 112 and part of the one hundred and seventh, amounting to $40,423,700, are not applied to the sinking fund, yet as arrearages have been in the years past continued to be counted on book accounts there is no reason why the payment of our bonds in excess of the legal requirements of the sinking fund should not equitably be credited, thus protecting us against a deficiency in the event that the internal taxes are largely reduced or altogether abolished.

In my opinion $75,000,000 of payment on account of current pensions and arrears is as much each year as can be safely made with due protection against frauds. Until the arrears are all paid—say $45,000,000 per year in addition to appropriations of years 1877-'78—we might be required to continue the tax on whisky, say at 50 cents per gallon, or we could encroach upon and reduce our now excessive unemployed balance in the Treasury. Admitting there might be a moderate deficiency, we have—to meet such deficiency—now in the Treasury $136,000,000 above and beyond every claim on the Government dollar for dollar.

It is thus made plain that with economical expenditures and reduced appropriations for the year we are fully provided.

As I have already said, a heavy reduction or the abolition of internal taxes would compel immediate revision of our tariff laws. How that can be done with most expedition is the question which most directly concerns us.

I do not favor a tariff enacted upon the ground of protection simply for the sake of protection, because I doubt the existence of any constitutional warrant for any such construction or the grant of any such power. It would manifestly be in the nature of class legislation, and to such legislation, favoring one class at the expense of any other, I have always been opposed.

In my judgment this question of free trade will not arise practically in this country during our lives, if ever, so long as we continue to raise revenue by duties on imports, and therefore the discussion of that principle is an absolute waste of time. After our public debt is paid in full our expenditures can hardly be much below $200,000,000, and if this is levied in a business-like and intelligent manner it will afford adequate protection to every industrial interest in the United States. The assertion that the Constitution permits the levying of duties in favor of protection "for the sake of protection" is equally uncalled for and unnecessary. Both are alike delusory and not involved in any practical administrative policy. If brought to the test I believe neither would stand for a day. Protection for the sake of protection is prohibition pure and simple of importation, and if there be no importation there will be no duties collected, and consequently no revenue, leaving the necessary expenses of the Government to be collected by direct taxes—for internal taxes would interfere with the protective principle, and when the people were generally asked to bear the burden of heavy taxation to sustain class legislation and the interests of a portion of our people at the expense of the great bulk of our population there would be an emphatic and conclusive negative. So, too, with free trade, there is hardly a man in public life who advocates it pure and simple. Nobody wants direct taxation, although it would bring taxation so near and so constantly before the people that Congress would hesitate long before it voted the sums of money it now does, if not for improper, at least for questionable purposes.

Let me cull a few sentences from recent debates to show the feeling on this subject.

Ex-Governor Hendricks says:

> A horizontal tariff is impossible.

Senator JAMES B. BECK says:

> Nobody asks or expects this Congress to establish free trade, or tear down custom-houses. * * * In adjusting taxation on imports with a view only to obtain revenue or "for revenue only," we never thought of discriminating against American industries, or of depriving them of the incidental benefits or protection a proper revenue tariff would afford.

Senator BAYARD says:

> The power to tax by laying duties upon imposts may be so exercised as to do what it has done ever since the foundation of the Government, and that is to give an advantage equivalent to the amount of the tax to the American producer or manufacturer over his foreign competitors in the same line of production or manufacture, and this becomes his protection.

Senator WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, says:

> Nobody is for free trade just now.

Senator COKE, of Texas, says:

As an inevitable consequence domestic manufacturers and producers of the articles upon which such revenue impost duties are laid are to that extent protected against foreign competition.

Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky, in substance reiterates these sentiments. So they all say, with rare exception. The real question which is presented and in controversy is the revision of taxes, so we may hold the control of the markets of the world for the benefit of our excess of productions over the home consumption.

I favor what Mr. Jefferson declared to be "discriminating duties," what General Jackson described as "a judicious tariff," and what Silas Wright designated as "incidental protection." To accomplish these ends wisely and well requires the greatest circumspection and the exercise of the most careful judgment.

I favor a commission "to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff."

It will, in my judgment, bring about a revision, absolutely essential, at an earlier day than in any other way now feasible. If I did not sincerely entertain this conviction, no member on this floor would be more opposed to the pending proposition than myself. I believe that the arrangement of our system of tariff duties should not rest upon any partisan policy regulated by existing parties, but that, on the contrary, it should in a measure be divorced from politics, and not be a bone of periodical contention in and out of Congress. It should occupy the higher level and command the best efforts of statesmanship of every party. Menschikoff, one of the ablest as well as one of the most successful ministers of modern times, said: "Statesmanship is a practical knowledge of a State's resources."

A judicious and properly laid tariff is the measure of those resources. It should be framed so as to give stability to our business at home and our trade abroad. Unnecessary and causeless changes are injurious both to the revenues and to the industries and commerce of the people. Remedial measures to cure defects and equalize burdens and benefits are of the greatest advantage when promptly and properly enacted. It would be a blessing of incalculable value if we could so arrange our legislation as to readjust in the main duties on imports only once in every ten years, and then have them based upon the statistics and widest information of our census tables. In this way business men in every branch of production and commerce would know how safely and judiciously to conduct their transactions great and small.

We now really have only a choice between no action and this proposed commission. It was originally introduced into Congress by a Democrat. A bill for such a commission was passed during the last Congress by a Democratic Senate. It has again passed the Senate this year with the aid of Democratic votes. It was very generally approved upon the "stump," in my section at least, during the recent Presidential contest. More recently the Ohio Democracy affirmed in the following language the propriety of its adoption:

A tariff for revenue, levied and adjusted in its details with a view to equity in the public burdens and the encouragement of protective industries without creating monopolies; and we favor the appointment of a commission to suggest a method of revision which shall accomplish this result.

Let me quote from one whose views are accepted by those who claim reform in the direction of free trade, as they are set forth in the North American Review of December, 1881, in an elaborate article by Mr. David A. Wells. After discussing fully the subject of "Reform in Federal Taxation," he says:

What, then, is to be done? There is but one answer. There must, or ought to be, a compromise, on the basis of patriotism and common sense, of all antagonizing interests in furtherance of a reform which has become imperative; and such a compromise is practicable by all parties agreeing to urge upon Congress to do at its next session those things only in respect to which a majority of all parties may agree should be done. At first thought, such a proposition may seem absurd and impracticable, but a little reflection will soon convince to the contrary. In the first place, no one is likely to object to the appointment of a commission to investigate and report on the whole subject of Federal tax reform, although Congress, judging from all precedents, is not likely to be much influenced by any report or recommendations which such commission may make, unless public attention has, in the mean time, become largely interested in its work and recommendations.

The public attention to which Mr. Wells alludes has already been very fully called to this subject, and to an extent which he himself did not expect when he penned that article.

The Senate has shown at this session an indisposition to respond to any effort which might have been made in this House, for it has anticipated the House in the creation of a tariff commission by an overwhelming vote. It has been frequently charged in this debate that the object of this bill was delay. There is no justification, in my opinion, for such an assertion. Its inevitable tendency and effect must be in the nature of things to hasten a thorough and speedy final adjustment of all questions in dispute as to tariff amendment and reform. When the ground of action is uncertain and the elements of the problem are not fully known, or are vaguely and imperfectly understood, legislation is generally injurious. Indeed it may be said in such cases that when it escapes doing serious injustice to the industries of the people or to the revenues of the Government, it has the result always to be avoided by wise and prudent legislators, of irritation and excitement, disturbance of values, and oftentimes individual ruin.

Self-interest controls the world, however much men may turn fine periods and grow eloquent in swelling sentences about abstractions; and while men will suffer patiently and yield willingly to stern necessity, they will not submit quietly to what is causelessly and idly to their loss and annoyance.

When every element which can enter into tariff revision is known; when every interest, large and small, is scanned and measured; when proper objects of taxation are reached and adjusted in their proper relations; when those items are eliminated which only embarrass and produce confusion, then indeed tariff legislation is made easy and sure and of happiest consequences.

The charge that we are improperly parting with our constitutional functions in the passage of this bill is invalid and should have no influence upon our deliberations and action.

The duties delegated to the commission do not extend beyond the power of recommendation. Yet I hope and believe their review when presented will be of so broad, comprehensive, and catholic a character as to command as a basis of action in reform of taxation the approval of thinking men of all parties.

The fourth section of the bill provides that the commission shall make its final report of the results of its investigation and the testimony taken in the course of the same not later than the first Monday of December, 1882, and it shall cause the testimony taken to be printed from time to time and distributed to members of Congress by the Public Printer, and shall also cause to be printed for the use of Congress 2,000 copies of its final report, together with the testimony.

Can language be more explicit to prevent delay? It means tariff revision, intelligent and just, at the earliest practical moment. I trust that after the passage of this act—of which at present there seems but little doubt—authority will be given to the Committee on Ways and Means by this House to enable it to assemble about the 10th day of November next, and proceed immediately to formulate a bill based upon the testimony taken, and which they will have with all other members received from time to time. Then at the opening of the session in December that committee will be ready to report forthwith its measure of relief to the House for action before the Committee on Appropriations will require the time for general appropriation bills.

I have given notice of a purpose to offer an amendment providing that this commission shall be composed of two members of the Senate and three members of the House, with four civilian experts, the latter to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. My purpose in favoring a mixed commission is that there may be upon the floor of each House some responsible sponsors for the report who will feel it incumbent upon them to see that it does not go for naught, but is supported and pushed to practical results.

Now, I might add that while I have no direct assurance of the fact, yet I am led to believe that the President will, in the composition of this commission, whether exclusively of civilians or only partially, select men who have given a life-time to the study of the history and philosophy of tariff taxation.

And now, Mr. Chairman, when the attempt is made to draw party lines on the subject of the tariff, I am strengthened in the conviction that in what I have said to-day I am sustained by the solemn and deliberate declarations of the Democratic party in national convention for more than forty years. It will be a fitting conclusion, therefore, to recall some of the words of wisdom of the statesmen of former times.

Seeing what the great men of the past have done, we may take heart and tread the path of triumph by emulating their worthy actions. I submit the expressions of the conventions alluded to, as far as they relate to revenues and expenditures. The first plank of the platform of the Democratic national convention which met in Baltimore May 5, 1840, is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government.

The Democratic national convention which met at Baltimore, May 27, 1844, was to the same purpose.

The platform of the Democratic convention at Baltimore, May 22, 1848, contained the following declaration of Democratic faith:

Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs; and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government and for the gradual but certain extinction of the debt created by the prosecution of a just and necessary war, after peaceful relations shall have been restored.

The platform of the Democratic convention at Baltimore, June 1, 1852, contains the following words as to the revenues and expenditures:

Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs; and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government and for the gradual but certain extinction of the public debt.

The same resolution was adopted at Cincinnati, Ohio, June 2, 1856; at Charleston, South Carolina, April 23, 1860, and at Baltimore, June 18, 1860.

The Democratic convention of 1864, at Saint Louis, on August 29, passed no tariff resolution.

The Democratic platform of 1868, in New York City, has the following resolution:

And a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country.

The national Democratic convention of Baltimore, July 9, 1872, resolved as follows:

We demand a system of Federal taxation which shall not unnecessarily interfere with the industry of the people, and which shall provide the means necessary to pay the expenses of the Government, economically administered; the pensions, the interest on the public debt, and a moderate reduction annually of the principal thereof; and recognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade, we remit the discussion of the subject to the people of their Congressional districts and to the decision of the Congress thereon wholly free from Executive interference or dictation.

The Saint Louis convention of 1876 declared as follows:

Reform is necessary in the sum and mode of Federal taxation, to the end that capital may be set free from distrust and labor lightly burdened.

We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly 4,000 articles as a monster piece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling, not a yearly rising revenue; it has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few; it prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor; it has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas; it has cut down the sales of American manufacturers at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture and industry followed by half our people; it costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor; it promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

The platform of 1880 at Cincinnati declared "for revenue only."

These utterances of the Democratic party, assembled from all parts of the United States in national convention, teach their own lesson to the present generation and need no commentary at my hands. It will not do for any public man to narrow his mind on such a momentous question as that which affects not only the integrity of the Government, but brightens or darkens the home of every citizen just as we shall legislate. Speculative philosophers have contrived the most fascinating forms of government, but wherever they have been subjected to the touch-stone of practical operation they have gone most shamefully to pieces. It will not do for men to say, I have laid down this theoretical landmark and you must not go beyond it.

> There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
> Rough-hew them how we will.

If Canute had not moved his chair upon the sea-shore the incoming tide would have overwhelmed him and his weak advisers under the mighty waves of the sea.

We are no longer a few scattered, isolated colonies of three millions of people, hugging the coast from Massachusetts to Georgia. In 1880 we were a united nation of fifty millions of inhabitants, with industries of the greatest diversity, and grown to such size and power as to contest the markets of the world, and with a military prestige that has surprised and kept in awe the most warlike nations.

In the year 1903 we are told that, according to the ordinary rate of increase, we will have one hundred millions of people. Is there any human mind that can foresee all the possibilities of a free republic of such vast proportions, leading the coming century in wise legislation? Is there one so foolhardy who will stand up and say he knows all about it, and that the wondrous ways of God shall bend to his peremptory dictation? If there be, he can vote against this bill. [Great applause.]

Mr. RANDALL, upon concluding his speech, yielded to Mr. WHITTHORNE and Mr. CURTIN.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, Mr. CURTIN, and Mr. TUCKER severally addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

[Before Mr. TUCKER concluded, the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to fix any time?

Mr. KELLEY. No, I do not desire to fix a time. I move that it be extended not to exceed one hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER resumed and concluded his remarks.]

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary; who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1014) for the relief of Joseph L. Stevens;

An act (H. R. No. 1049) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service and to encourage the saving of life from shipwreck;

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A bill (S. No. 263) to submit to the Court of Claims the petition of George W. Plant for damages done to the steamer Lady of the Lake by collision with the United States steamer Gettysburgh;

A bill (S. No. 1483) for the relief of Guy V. Henry.

TARIFF-COMMISSION.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. KELLEY addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. KASSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Before the committee rises, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa to what extent he proposes to admit amendments to be offered.

Mr. KASSON. I think that can best be settled in the House.

The motion of Mr. KASSON was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2315) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the special order. Pending that motion I move that all debate upon the bill and amendments that may be offered be closed in one minute after going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us understand that motion. Of course it does not cut off amendments.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, it has no relation to anything except closing the general debate.

Mr. KASSON. I go further. After conversation with gentlemen on both sides of the House I desire this motion to cover the entire debate, leaving gentlemen free to offer their amendments, so that we may at once proceed to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand. The motion, as the gentleman now explains, is to close all debate in one minute.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. All general debate.

The SPEAKER. All debate, as the Chair now understands from the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RANDALL. I so understood the gentleman at first.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has corrected its statement of the motion of the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that there ought to be a few minutes—say two, or three, or five—allowed for debate on each amendment pro and con. I make this suggestion with no purpose of delay whatever. It is only just to the subject-matter of the amendments.

Mr. KASSON. If that be the desire on that side, as it has been my purpose, and the gentleman is aware of my purpose, as we discussed this thing in advance——

Mr. RANDALL. There will be no effort for delay on this side.

Mr. KASSON. If that be the desire on the other side of the House, then I am ready to accommodate gentlemen by modifying my proposition so that there shall be on each substantive amendment, not including amendments to amendments or merely pro forma amendments, a debate limited to five minutes on either side.

Mr. SPRINGER. The rule provides for that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and pending that motion moves that all debate on the bill and amendments which may be offered thereto may be limited to one minute, except that on substantive amendments there shall be five minutes on either side.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object. That is provided for in the rules now.

Mr. KASSON. The rules now provide that there may be debate on pro forma amendments, while my proposition is that there shall be only on substantive amendments five minutes on either side.

Mr. SPRINGER. The rule governs all but the closing of general debate, and the point I make is that there can be no amendment of the rules in that respect without unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rule at any time prior to entering on the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule the five minutes' debate cannot be limited unless by unanimous consent. All general debate can be closed as it is proposed by the gentleman from Iowa without unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. I want the five minutes' debate also to be closed by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule will not permit us to cut off the five minutes' debate on amendments offered until we have entered on that five minutes' debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the rule in the same way.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to any modification of the rule at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that when the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union all general debate shall be limited to one minute. That motion is in order and is the one now pending.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that all debate be limited to five minutes on each side of any substantive amendment, not including pro forma amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again put the question to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; I object.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection, as that is only fair and meets the wishes of the other gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no disposition to filibuster or delay action on this bill; but if we desire, when we have entered into five minutes' discussion, a longer time, we ought to have it, as the rules provide.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means do not object to this or ask any further debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I have a right to object, and I do object.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No one questions the gentleman's right.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to offer amendments, and I wish to have the opportunity under the five-minute rule to debate them.

Mr. BLACKBURN. You have it under the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SPRINGER. The rule provides for it.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to corroborate the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, that my proposition is acceptable to all the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. The House must have observed I have tried in every way to accommodate myself to the wishes of our friends on the other side. I think the proposition I have submitted is a fair one and ought not to be objected to.

Mr. SPRINGER. The rules provide for five-minute debate, and that is all I ask for.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the proposition?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not object to a proposition that there shall be five minutes' debate on either side, as that is all I have asked for.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa is that debate under the five-minute rule shall be limited to five minutes on either side of a substantive amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all we have asked for.

Mr. KASSON. The intention was to cut off debate on pro forma amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. KASSON. I now move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I object to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's objection comes too late.

Mr. BROWNE. I desire to call attention to the fact that at half-past four o'clock there is to be a recess until half-past seven, by a special order of the House, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of pension and other bills provided for in the order.

Mr. KASSON. Could not that order be waived for this afternoon by substituting another evening?

Mr. BROWNE. It is important that the order of the House shall be executed.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Iowa now has the bill in such situation that the recess will not interfere with it. It will come up for consideration hereafter, with the same privileges it now has.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa insist upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. KASSON. I do insist upon it. I renew the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the tariff-commission bill. By order of the House all general debate upon the bill is limited to one minute.

Mr. KASSON. Let the first section of the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a commission is hereby created to be called the "tariff commission," to consist of nine members.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of section 1 the following:

"Two of whom shall be members of the Senate, and be appointed by the President pro tempore of that body; three of whom shall be members of the House of Representatives, and be appointed by the Speaker of the House; and four of whom shall be from civil life, and be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Also, strike out lines 1, 2, and 3, and the first seven words in line 4 of section 2.

Mr. RANDALL. I will reserve the five minutes allowed for debate upon this amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under further consideration the tariff-commission bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. KASSON. I move that when the House next resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tariff-commission bill all debate upon the bill and pending amendments be limited to five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that an arrangement had been arrived at which met the views of the gentleman from Iowa, that debate should be allowed on substantive amendments for five minutes on each side.

Mr. KASSON. I was under the impression that gentlemen on the other side desired to offer only the one amendment which is pending.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, there are other amendments to be offered.

Mr. KASSON. Then of course under the arrangement the debate would proceed in Committee of the Whole for five minutes for and against each substantive amendment which may properly be presented. Now, if gentlemen have other amendments they desire to offer, I would suggest that they be printed in the RECORD for information.

Mr. CARLISLE. I was about to suggest to the gentleman to allow all amendments to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KASSON. I hope that will be done for information. I do not want any misunderstanding in reference to these amendments. It is understood they are printed only for reference, not to be considered as pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not consider them as pending, but printed only for information.

Mr. McLANE submitted the following proposed amendment:

To recommit with instructions to report a bill for the repeal of all internal revenue taxation except the tax on spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco, and for the reduction of the tax on whisky to fifty cents per gallon and for the reduction of the tax on fermented liquors and tobacco 10 per cent. per annum until the same shall cease absolutely, and that the President is hereby authorized and required to reduce the clerical force now employed in the collection of internal revenue to the extent which in his judgment can be effected without prejudice to the public interests, and with the further instruction to report a bill reducing all existing duties on imports to a maximum revenue standard.

Mr. SPRINGER. I give notice that at the proper time I will offer the following amendment to the tariff-commission bill, namely:

Amend the third section by adding thereto the following:

"The President shall appoint as members of said commission well recognized representatives of the various interests of the country as follows:

"Four commissioners to represent agricultural interests.

"One commissioner to represent the persons employed in the building and operating of railroads.

"One commissioner to represent the persons employed in the manufacture of iron and steel and of cotton and woolen goods.

"One commissioner to represent the manufacturers of such goods.

"One commissioner to represent the persons employed in other mechanical occupations.

"One commissioner to represent the manufacturers of agricultural implements, stoves, and the various kinds of machinery."

APPROPRIATION FOR FUEL, LIGHTS, ETC.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to present the joint resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that the same be printed in the RECORD and also in the usual form, as I hope to call it up for consideration to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 204) making an appropriation for fuel, lights, water, &c., for the fiscal year 1882, and for other purposes.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for fuel, lights, water, and miscellaneous items required in the proper care of all the public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, the sum of $60,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

For contingent expenses of the office of the Secretary of War, such as blank-books, stationery, labor, books, maps, gas, and miscellaneous items, $2,000.

For contingent expenses of the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army, such as fuel and gas, ice, office furniture, painting, glazing, and plumbing, and repairs for building numbered 1725 F street northwest, $500.

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia may apply the amounts appropriated for the payment of the salaries of teachers of public schools for the present fiscal year in conformity with the schedule of salaries recommended by the board of trustees of public schools, and approved by the commissioners, and under which the teachers for the present fiscal year were appointed and have received monthly payments from September to February last, inclusive.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BURROWS, will preside at the evening session of to-day. The hour of half past four o'clock having now arrived, the Chair, in obedience to the previous order of the House, declares the House in recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. to-day.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) reassembled, Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. JOYCE. I move that the House take a further recess of ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock and forty minutes p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which this session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until the further order of the House, on Friday of each week the House shall take a recess at 4.30 o'clock until 7.30 o'clock, at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions only shall be considered. April 14, 1882, amended, on motion of Mr. JOYCE, so as to include the consideration of bills granting condemned cannon, not to interfere with bills above named: Provided, That general debate shall be in order at such sessions, not to interfere with said bills.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. BRIGGS in the chair.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering bills under the special assignment of business heretofore made by the House for this evening's session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE. As there are some five or six invalid pension cases on the Calendar to which objections have been made heretofore, I ask that the committee by unanimous consent commence the consideration of causes at House bill No. 1442, at page 37 of the Calendar, the case of William Rickards.

Mr. BEACH. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to so modify his request as to permit taking up for immediate consideration the second bill on page 36. This bill was laid over the other night on objection from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] now absent, under a misapprehension. It will take no time. A bare statement of the facts will show it is a very meritorious bill, and I think it will require no argument or discussion.

Mr. BROWNE. I have no objection to that bill being taken up if such be the disposition of the committee.

Mr. JOYCE. There is one case on the Calendar previous to that, to which I would like to get the attention of the committee for about a minute. It is on the twenty-third page, the second bill from the top. I can state the facts connected with it in a moment.

Mr. BROWNE. In order to obviate the necessity of having a multitude of motions of this kind I withdraw my proposition.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not do that, because there are cases on which there will certainly be controversy.

Mr. BROWNE. I withdraw the motion, with the distinct understanding that I will ask that cases likely to cause discussion be passed over when we reach them.

Mr. JOYCE. After I have made a very brief statement, if any member of the committee objects to the bill I have indicated I will let it go over.

ANDREW J. MORRISON.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the first pension bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 2142) granting arrearages of pension to Andrew J. Morrison. Adverse.

Mr. JOYCE. This bill provides as follows:

That the pension authorized for Andrew J. Morrison by the act of Congress approved February 7, 1879, shall commence from the date of the disability for which the same was authorized, in the same manner as if said pension had been allowed and authorized by the general laws regulating pensions.

I will not stop to read the report which I hold in my hand, but will merely state that Colonel Morrison enlisted in the Army, went into the service, and served until the spring of 1862, when the time of the command to which he belonged expired. He was then on the Peninsula with the Army of the Potomac. I think it was about the 1st of May that his time expired.

Rather than leave the service and go home Colonel Morrison continued in the service. Without being mustered in or without a commission he was a volunteer aid upon the staff of General Palmer, and served in the Peninsula campaign until the 25th of June, when he was severely wounded. He continued to serve with General Palmer in that campaign from that time down to September 16, 1862, when he was ordered by the War Department home to recruit a regiment, and he did go home and recruited a regiment of cavalry.

In 1879 Congress by a special act granted Colonel Morrison a pension, which of course dated from February 7, 1879, the date of the passage of the act. This bill is brought to grant him the same pension from June 25, 1862, the day he was wounded, down to the time that that law gave him a pension. It gives him the same pension he would be entitled to if he had been a regularly-enlisted man.

That is all there is of this case. Colonel Morrison would not go home when his time expired, but remained there with us upon the Peninsula, and fought through that campaign down to the 16th of September, 1862, the day of the battle of Antietam, or within a day of that battle, and then he was ordered home to recruit the regiment I have spoken of.

This bill is nothing but an act of justice to that gallant officer. I know Colonel Morrison, and have known him for years; and I not only know him as a gentleman, but I know he was a brave soldier. And in view of the fact that he remained with that command during that time without being mustered in, and not only that, but furnished his own horse and his own equipments during that time, I say this is nothing but an act of justice. If I remember aright, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Invalid Pensions would have granted this officer the pension that he asked for had it not been for the fact that a rule had been established to grant arrearages of pension.

Mr. MATSON. Did he serve without pay?

Mr. JOYCE. He served without pay during the time I have spoken of, from the early part of May, 1862, down to the 16th of September. I do not think any gentleman on the committee will have any objection to granting Colonel Morrison this pension, which it seems to me he is most justly entitled to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Is it a bill to grant arrears?

Mr. JOYCE. It is in the nature of arrears not to the present time but only to 1879.

Mr. BROWNE. I do not doubt the gallantry of Colonel Morrison. But to grant this pension will be against the report of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, and I must support the action of the committee and object to the consideration of this bill, unless it can be done by a quorum of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the bill will be passed over informally. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. JOYCE. No, it is not satisfactory to me, because I think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman from Vermont desire a vote upon the bill?

Mr. JOYCE. Not at all; that would be useless. There are only about a dozen members in the House.

The bill was then passed over informally.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The next pension bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1218) for the relief of the widows of John R. Gale, Spencer D. Gray, Lemuel Griggs, Malachi J. Brumsey, I. Munden, Lewis White, and George W. Wilson, of North Carolina.

Mr. BROWNE. This is one of the cases that I must ask to be passed over informally.

Mr. LATHAM. There has already been passed by both Houses of Congress a bill for the benefit of persons of the Life-Saving Service, and it only requires the signature of the President to become a law.

In view of the fact that this bill proposes to give these persons much less than is contemplated to be given to persons in the Life-Saving Service in the future, surely there can be now no objection to its passage. The bill already passed both Houses does not cover the cases of these particular persons. That bill proposes to give in the future to persons disabled in the Life-Saving Service one year's full pay, and in some cases two years' pay. This bill proposes merely to give to these persons a pension equal to that given to seamen in the Navy, $8 a month. I would like very much to have this bill passed to-night if possible.

Mr. BROWNE. I will state to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. LATHAM] that I am personally in favor of this bill, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions reported favorably upon it. But it is useless to call it up to-night; it cannot be passed under the circumstances, and will simply interrupt and delay the other business of the evening. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to its being passed over informally.

The bill was accordingly passed over informally.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1976) granting a pension to the minor children of Aaron Sheridan, deceased.

The CHAIRMAN. That is one of the bills which was passed over informally the other evening, and the Chair supposes that it will take the same course this evening.

There was no objection, and the bill was passed over informally.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1736) granting a pension to Horace S. Spear.

Mr. MATSON. For the purpose of getting this bill off the Calendar, and I think, perhaps, with the full consent of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] who reported it, I will move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. JOYCE. What bill is that?

Mr. MATSON. The Spear case.

Mr. JOYCE. I wish the committee would pass that over informally.

Mr. MATSON. Very well; I will withdraw my motion.

The bill was accordingly passed over informally.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2328) granting a pension to Joseph R. Benjamin; reported unfavorably from the Committee of the Whole and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. BROWNE. I will move to pass over informally all the pension bills down to House bill No. 1147, on page 36 of the Calendar, granting a pension to Elizabeth Vernor Henry.

There was no objection.

ELIZABETH VERNOR HENRY.

The next bill considered by the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. No. 1147) granting a pension to Elizabeth Vernor Henry, which had been amended at the former session of the Committee of the Whole to read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Vernor Henry, orphan sister of the late Commander Edmund W. Henry, of the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension of $25 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill at the last evening session for pension bills was amended so as to read as the Clerk has now read the bill. The question is upon laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BEACH. I will state in regard to this bill that under existing law the sister of a deceased officer is not entitled to a pension. If she was there would have been no occasion for this bill.

This aged lady now appeals to Congress for relief under peculiar circumstances. Her brother, Commander Edmund Wilkes Henry, served for thirty years in the Navy and died from diseases contracted in the service. I have in my hand from the files of the Navy Department his naval history, beginning with his appointment as a midshipman in 1842, showing his various promotions up to the rank of commander and ending with his death in 1873. He was a gallant officer and performed distinguished services during the late war.

When he died he left neither father, mother, widow, nor children. His only relative was this sister, unmarried and an orphan, who had been supported by him during his lifetime. Now that he is dead she appeals to Congress for this pension, inasmuch as she is far advanced in years and in a very dependent condition.

Mr. PRESCOTT. How old is she?

Mr. BEACH. Fifty-five years of age. The bill was reported favorably by the committee of the Forty-sixth Congress, and it has also been reported favorably in this Congress by a unanimous committee. I think the House will agree with the committee in the opinion that in view of the valuable services rendered by the brother of this petitioner, and the fact that he left no immediate relative save her, this is a proper case for a gratuity pension.

Mr. BROWNE. I presume there is no objection to this case.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE. If the Committee of the Whole will indulge me again, I ask unanimous consent that we pass in the Calendar to House bill No. 1442, on page 37, the intervening bills having been reported adversely.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

WILLIAM RICKARDS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1442) for the relief of William Rickards.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to liquidate and pay to William Rickards, jr., late colonel of the Twenty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as shall be found to have been withheld from him by reason of a reduction of his pension from 1866 to 1871.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1442) for the relief of William Rickards, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

The pensioner was allowed total in rank $30 per month from date of discharge November 2, 1864, for severe gunshot wound of left breast. Under the biennial examination of 1865, the rate was reduced to three-fourths of total, $22.50. Dissatisfied with that rate he applied for increase December 10, 1870. It was evident from the medical examination under the claim of increase that the disability was total, and $30 were allowed from the date of the examination, February 11, 1871. This action was proper under the law. That the disability has been permanent in a total degree ever since discharge cannot be doubted. The reduction made by a surgeon inexperienced in the rating of disabilities, and the inability of the Pension-Office to correct the error except through an application for increase, has deprived the pensioner of a part of his pension to which he was justly entitled because of the severe nature of the wound.

The committee is clearly of the opinion that injustice has been done in the case, and therefore reports favorable on the bill, and recommends that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALBERT O. MILLER.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1543) granting a pension to Albert O. Miller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albert O. Miller, late a seaman on board the United States steamship Bienville, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment recommended by the committee, to strike out at the end of the bill the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act," was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee have duly considered House bill No. 1543, and report that they find the facts as set forth in report made in this case in the Forty-sixth Congress, as follows:

"That Albert O. Miller enlisted as a seaman in the United States Navy on the 23d day of September, 1864; that on the 15th day of January, 1865, while in such service and in line of duty, he participated in the capture of Fort Fisher; that after the capture of the fort the boats from which he and others had disembarked were found beached and partly filled with sand and water; that an attempt was made to bail the boats and prepare them for use, in which said Miller became drenched with the surf, and that he remained on the beach all night thoroughly wet by the exposure; that in consequence he suffered a severe attack of neuralgia and rheumatism, and that he has since suffered continuously from such rheumatism so contracted up to the present time; that his physical condition is now such by reason of said disease that he requires the regular aid and assistance of some other person, on account of total physical disability; that said Albert O. Miller was honorably discharged from the Naval service of the United States; that he has made due and regular application for a pension (Naval claim No. 3286), and has fully established his right to a pension of the amount named in the bill, save that he has failed to establish the facts of the time, place, and circumstances under which he contracted his said disability; that on account of such failure his application has been rejected by the Interior Department; that such failure has been by reason of the inability of said Miller to ascertain the whereabouts of his mates, the seamen who were present and had actual knowledge of said facts, and such failure has been notwithstanding diligent efforts on the part of said Miller to ascertain the whereabouts of such persons."

The committee, believing the case to be meritorious, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as amended.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

THOMAS W. ROTHROCK.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1451) granting a pension to Thomas W. Rothrock.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas W. Rothrock, late of Company G, Eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, on account of disabilities incurred while in the service and in line of duty; said pension to commence the 27th day of January, 1863, that being the date of his final discharge from the United States Army.

The report is as follows:

That the committee have duly considered the bill (H. R. No. 1451) and find the facts as stated in a report made in the Forty-sixth Congress by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which is as follows:

"We find from an examination of the petition and of papers on file in the original claim at the Pension Office that the petitioner was a bugler of Company G, Eighty-first Pennsylvania Cavalry; that he enlisted September 3, 1861, and was discharged January 27, 1863; that he filed his application for pension May 7, 1870, and that the case was finally rejected by the Pension Office December 27, 1879.

"The petitioner, in his declaration of pension, alleges a rupture on the right side, received the latter part of September, 1862, by being thrown on the pommel of his saddle on the march to Snicker's Gap, Virginia.

"The testimony presented in the case shows, by his family physician, that the petitioner was free from hernia at the time of his enlistment. The evidence of two comrades is, that while in the line of duty and on the march aforesaid, the petitioner was ruptured; that they had personal knowledge of the injury; saw it occur while the petitioner was jumping his horse over a ditch; that they helped him off his horse and found the disability. Another comrade testifies to the same facts, and further that he took charge of the petitioner's horse and led him to the captain's quarters. The captain of the company testifies that about the time the petitioner alleges he received the injury he was reported to him as having been injured, and that he was unable to ride his horse; that he ordered him sent to hospital; that at the time the petitioner entered the service and up to the time he was disabled he was apparently sound and certainly free from hernia. The captain further states that he firmly believes the disability was contracted in the service.

"The petitioner also swears that he received no treatment while in the Army, nor did any surgeon examine his rupture.

"His family physician states that upon his return home he found him laboring with an irreducible hernia. Two neighbors and associates state that they knew the petitioner from his boyhood up; that they were members of a brass band with him; bathed with him, dressing and undressing in each other's presence; that they know positively that up to the time he enlisted the petitioner was free from hernia or any other disability.

"The records of the Adjutant-General's Office show by the rolls for September and October, 1862, that the petitioner was on duty service at camp near Knoxville, Maryland; November and December, 1862, and January and February, 1863, he was sick in hospital at Washington. He was discharged for disability January 27, 1863. It further states: 'Upon re-examination this man is reported on the monthly roll of Company G as absent in hospital; place and date cannot be determined. Company return for August, 1862, does not show him absent. Company morning reports from August to December, 1862, furnish no information.'

"The certificate of disability gives as the ground of his discharge 'total loss of teeth, preventing him from blowing his bugle.'

"Two boards of the examining surgeons of the Pension Office, one at Philadelphia and one at this city, find the petitioner ruptured with hernia, the last-named board rating him at $8 per month. The ground of rejection by the Pension Office is that the records do not show him present with his company at the time he alleges he was disabled. The records do show him on detached duty at camp within twenty-five or thirty miles of the place where he alleges he received the injury. As the company rolls cover a period of two months at the time, and as the petitioner's company was ordered out on a quick march, it is fair to presume that his services as bugler being needed, he joined his company and was present, as he alleges, at Snickersville, Virginia, notwithstanding the fact that the record does not show it.

"Your committee is impressed with this idea, in view of the fact that three comrades, whose veracity is unquestioned and whose presence is verified, swear positively that he was present as alleged and that he was injured as alleged. We are of the belief that the discrepancy existing between the records and the sworn testimony of three comrades and a commissioned officer should not militate against the petitioner's right to a pension. From the evidence before us we are satisfied that he is a worthy subject and entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the pension laws, notwithstanding the technical objection of the Pension Office."

We therefore report favorably upon his claim, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, "granting a pension to Thomas U. Rothrock" as amended.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out at the end of the bill all after the words "in line of duty," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH S. SEELEY.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 450) for the relief of Elizabeth S. Seeley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Elizabeth S. Seeley, widow of Sherman M. Seeley, late a captain in the Twenty-seventh Regiment of New York Volunteers, upon the pension-roll of the United States, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $17 per month, commencing from the —— day of ——, 18—.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 450) for the relief of Elizabeth S. Seeley, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

It is satisfactorily established by the papers on file that the petitioner is the widow of Sherman M. Seeley, who enlisted as a private in the Sturgis Rifles June 15, 1861, and served with that command until May 21, 1862, when he was transferred to the Twenty-seventh New York Volunteers, in which he was commissioned as a first lieutenant. During the engagement at Crampton's Gap, South Mountain, Maryland, he was wounded in the right thigh, and on this account received a leave of absence for twenty days, which was afterward extended to sixty days, at the end of which he returned to his command in a feeble condition and requiring the use of a cane and crutch. Medical evidence of the officer's condition during his absence from his regiment shows the wound to have been a serious one, the ball having traversed the tissues of the thigh for upward of five inches, and that numerous abscesses formed in the neighborhood of the injured parts, which required repeated surgical interference. The officer's general health suffered in consequence, and the attending physicians testify that he suffered from blood-poisoning.

After his returning to his command his condition gradually improved, although he had not fully recovered his health when he took part in the siege of Fredericksburgh, where he suffered much from fatigue and exposure, and was in consequence prostrated by an attack of pneumonia, which disabled him for many weeks, and from which the evidence is conclusive that he never recovered.

It is in evidence that Seeley was a faithful soldier and officer, and that his widow, who devoted herself faithfully to him until his death, is in destitute circumstances.

J. P. Taylor, of Labette County, Kansas, testifies that he knew Captain Sherman M. Seeley well, and was his comrade, and that before receiving his wound he was a sound and robust man; that he took good care of himself as a soldier, and was temperate and prudent in his habits. That he last saw said officer at the Brainard House, Elmira, New York, (immediately after he had been discharged from the Army.) He was then very low and unable to speak in his usual voice.

Dr. J. H. Page, acting assistant surgeon, says: "In my opinion Captain Seeley's health was greatly impaired by long-continued and exhausting discharge from his wounds, complicated with pyemia and abscesses."

Dr. John M. Johnson, of Atlanta, Georgia, the attending physician at the time of his death, testifies that Seeley's health had been previously impaired and his constitution broken down.

It seems well proved that Seeley was sound and vigorous when he enlisted, and after his promotion to a first lieutenancy, and in fact until he was wounded. That he had only partially recovered from the effects of the wound when he was attacked with pneumonia, and that from the latter he never fully recovered. He sought health by changing his residence to Chicago, to Kansas, and finally to Atlanta, where in 1873 he succumbed to an acute attack of fever, which was in all human probability fatal only because it found him in a condition of debility caused by his chronic ailments, to which he would have succumbed a little later.

The claim has been rejected in the Pension Office on the ground that the acute disease was not contracted in the service. Your committee, however, believe that it is reasonably certain that his death was due to acute disease attacking a man already nearly at death's door because of disease contracted in the service, and in the line of duty, and therefore beg leave to report the bill back favorably with the recommendation that it do pass, so amended as to provide that Elizabeth S. Seeley receive a pension at the rate of $17 per month from and after the passage of this bill.

The amendment recommended by the committee, to strike out, at the end of the bill, the words "from the —— day of ——, 18—," and insert, "from and after the passage of this act," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

LOUISA BAINBRIDGE HOFF.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 526) for the relief of Louisa Bainbridge Hoff.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act there be paid, out of the Navy pension fund, to Mrs. Louisa Bainbridge Hoff, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Henry K. Hoff, United States Navy, the sum of $50 per month during her widowhood, the same to be in lieu of her present pension.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 526) for the relief of Louisa Bainbridge Hoff, have considered the same, and make the following report:

The Senate at this session reported this bill favorably, and we adopt that report, which is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of Louisa Bainbridge Hoff, having examined the same, report:

"That both the Senate and House Committee on Pensions have heretofore made favorable reports upon this case, and the bill increasing Mrs. Hoff's pension to $50 per month has once passed the Senate. The last favorable report by the Senate committee was made to the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress. Your committee concur with the former action of the committee and Senate, and adopt the last report made to the Senate, as follows:

"'That Commodore Henry Kuhn Hoff served for many years in the United States Navy with great distinction, and died of disease contracted in the service and in the line of duty, in the year 1878, he holding at that time the rank of commodore.

"'The bill grants a pension to his widow at the rate of $50 per month, instead of $30, the rate now allowed by law.

"'In consideration of the great length of time during which Commodore Hoff served his country, and of the distinguished character of his services, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.'

"This bill has been favorably reported and was passed by the Senate, and favorably reported by the House committee at the last session of Congress, but was not reached in the call of the Calendar before adjournment."

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JUSTUS BEEBE.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 800) granting a pension to Justus Beebe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Justus Beebe, late of Company G, Eighth Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 800) granting a pension to Justus Beebe, have had the same under consideration, and report:

This case was favorably reported by this committee at the last Congress; that report is fully sustained by the evidence, and is as follows:

"The evidence in this case shows that Sergeant Justus Beebe enlisted in the service of the United States at Flint, Michigan, in Company G, Eighth Regiment Michigan Volunteers, to serve three years or during the war, and was discharged August 18, 1862, for disability. The certificate of discharge gives hernia as cause of disability, and that said Beebe was ruptured at time of enlistment.

"On this statement the claim was disallowed. But there is no other evidence to support the statement of the surgeon who made this certificate for discharge, showing that claimant was ruptured at time of enlistment, but, on the contrary, Dr. Samuel Lathrop testifies that he has known Justus Beebe for the last past twenty-five years, and has been the family physician of Justus Beebe's father's family for that period of time; that he treated Justus Beebe prior to enlistment in the United States service for inflammation of the bladder, and that he is positive he had no hernia, for the reason that he made an examination at that time. Dr. Lathrop further states that immediately after his (Beebe's) return from the Army he knows he was suffering with hernia that opens into scrotum, and has been ever since his discharge.

"The evidence further shows that claimant alleges scrotal hernia of left side, caused by a fall down stairs while on ship Vanderbilt, going from Annapolis, Maryland, to Hilton Head, with his command, about December 15, 1861, and was in line of duty when the accident occurred. His statement is corroborated by two comrades, William Christian and Sylvester W. Eccleston, who were with him at the time. Christian testifies that he detailed Sergeant Beebe to take command of the guard on that day, and that after his fall he was so injured that he had to relieve him from duty, and that after that time, while in the service, he was not able to do duty in the ranks, but had to be detailed on light duty.

"Dr. Hulbert B. Shank, surgeon of the Eighth Michigan Regiment Infantry Volunteers, testifies that some time in the winter of 1862, while the said regiment was quartered at Beaufort, South Carolina, the said Justus Beebe applied to the deponent for medical treatment, and upon making examination found that he was suffering from incipient inguinal hernia, and adjusted a truss for such trouble and excused him from duty on account thereof.

"Your committee are of opinion from the foregoing evidence that the disability did originate in the service, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MERRITT LEWIS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 801) to increase the pension of Merritt Lewis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Merritt Lewis, late a private in Company K, Seventh Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and that he receive a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 801) to increase the pension of Merritt Lewis, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

This claimant was a member of Company K, Seventh Regiment of Michigan Volunteer Cavalry. At the battle of Gettysburgh he received a wound which resulted in the amputation of his right leg above the knee, and while in Camden Street Hospital, Baltimore, he was attacked by scarlet fever, causing total deafness. He receives a pension of $24 per month for the loss of his leg. The Pension Office has decided that under the law the above sum is all that can be given him. The present Commissioner says this case is one that should have special relief at the hands of Congress. If Lewis had lost his leg at the hip-joint he would be entitled to a pension of $37.50 per month, or if he required the assistance of another person he would receive $50 per month. We think his disability is quite equal to the loss of a leg by amputation at the hip-joint. We recommend the passage of the bill, with amendments, as follows:

Amend, in the sixth line, by striking out "infantry" and inserting "cavalry."

Amend, in the seventh line, by striking out "fifty dollars" and inserting "thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents."

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

LABAN CONNOR.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 803) granting a pension to Laban Connor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Laban Connor, late of Company E, Eighth Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 863) granting a pension to Laban Connor, have had the same under consideration, and report:

A bill granting a gension to this claimant was favorably considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions at the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress. We have again examined the evidence in the case, and find the report made to the Forty-sixth Congress fully sustained. The report is as follows:

"It appears that Laban Connor was serving in Company E of the Eighth Michigan Volunteers; while in the service and in the line of duty, on the 15th day of June, 1864, at Petersburgh, Virginia, while the regiment was charging the enemy the company had to seek cover in a deep rifle-pit; that he fell just at the edge of said rifle-pit, rolling into it, and before he could raise himself up the men who were just behind him jumped on him and injured his back so that he could not get up or away without help. A few days after he was injured he was sent home to Michigan, receiving his discharge and a pass before he left Petersburgh. On his way home he lost his discharge, how or where he does not know; he was not treated in any hospital for this disability, but came on to his home in Michigan, where he was treated by Dr. Isaac Wixon, his family physician, who also testifies that he was acquainted with claimant and has been since 1858, and before he enlisted and went into the service in 1864 he was a strong, healthy, and sound man.

"The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim on the ground that he was not mustered into the service. While the records in the War Department do not show his service as an enlisted man, the testimony of Captain E. M. Hovey, of said regiment, is to the effect that he saw the claimant mustered into the service. This is corroborated by the testimony of Edward Marum, captain of Company E, and Benjamin F. Pearse, orderly sergeant of Company G, same regiment, and their testimony also proves conclusively that the claimant received the disability at the time and place alleged. And Dr. G. E. Wolers, examining surgeon at Fentonville, Michigan, certifies that he has examined the claimant and finds that the disability originated, as stated by claimant, in the service and in the line of duty, and that the disability is permanent and will continue to increase. He says:

"'I find soreness, on pressure, in the spine between and below the shoulder blade; also curvature of the spine. There is a pain extending from the spine to the right side just under the breast. The head and shoulders are thrown forward so much that he cannot stand erect. The curvature is on the increase. There is extreme weakness in the spine, so much so that it is difficult for him to rise when down.'

"In addition to the preceding testimony in regard to the service of Laban Connor in the regiment and company in which he served, Corporal William S. Jewell, of the company in which Conner served, testifies under oath that—

"'He is personally acquainted with Laban Connor, late a private of Company E, Eighth Regiment Michigan Infantry; knew him before he enlisted; saw him in the lines at the city of Flint, where he was mustered, together with myself and others. While drawn in line the paymaster called each man's name in the order in which it came, and he heard Laban Connor's name called, and saw him draw one month's pay and first installment of bounty, amounting in all to $73, and saw him make his mark to pay-roll, and knows that he drew his clothing, gun, and rations; he saw him in the battle of the Wilderness, and the fight in front of Petersburgh, and the battle of Spottsylvania. He knows of him being disabled and discharged for his present disability.'

"And he further testifies that said Connor was a good, faithful soldier, never shirking his duty. Captain Edwin M. Hovey, captain of the company, testifies to substantially the same thing, as does Corporal Jewell, and says, in addition, that when Conner drew his first month's pay and part bounty, in all $73, he gave it to him (Captain Hovey) for safe keeping. He also testifies to the faithful service of the soldier, and to the fact of his being disabled as stated and being discharged in consequence of the disability.

"John Reason says on oath that he was the neighbor of Laban Connor, and when he enlisted in the Army he went with him to the city of Flint, and was there when he was enlisted and sworn into the service, and saw him after he received his bounty and first month's pay, and received from Captain Hovey, of the company in which Conner had enlisted, the said sum of $73 mentioned in the affidavit of Captain Hovey, on the order of Connor. This seems to prove clearly the service of the soldier; and the fact that his name is not on the rolls of the War Department seems to be an omission or neglect on the part of some one which has worked a great injury to this claimant.

While the claimant may not have a legal right to a pension, in consequence of this omission in the records, he has an equitable one; and as he served faithfully as a brave soldier in the Army and obtained his disability while in line of duty, and his officers and comrades all testifying to his general worth as a soldier, and the medical testimony proving that his disability is such that demands a pension, your committee feel that this is a meritorious case, and waive the fact that the records in the War Department do not show his enlistment, and report in favor of the bill granting said Laban Connor a pension. They therefore report back the accompanying bill and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

BETSY A. SMITH.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5805) granting a pension to Betsy A. Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, instructed to place on the pension-roll the name of Betsy A. Smith, widow of Mark Smith, late an ordnance-sergeant in the United States Army, who died while on duty at Fort Griswold, Connecticut, September 30, 1879; said pension to date from the death of her husband, and to be in accordance with the provisions of the general pension law governing such cases.

Mr. BROWNE. As no gentleman representing the Committee on Pensions appears to be present, I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the petition of Mrs. Betsey A. Smith, widow of the late Mark W. Smith, and find satisfactory testimonials and evidence that the said Mark W. Smith was in the United States service for fifty-three and three-quarter years, occupying the position of ordnance sergeant the most of the time and at his death, and that he died from the effects of disease contracted while on duty at Fort Griswold, Connecticut; and that during the late war he had six sons in the service, two of whom lost their lives in the service. He was always known as a faithful soldier. The petitioner, Mrs. Betsey A. Smith, is now very old and feeble, with no one to depend upon for her support. Therefore we report favorably the bill for her relief, and recommend that a pension be granted her, commencing at the date of the death of her husband, September 30, 1879, to be in accordance with the provisions of the general law governing such cases.

Mr. BROWNE. I must insist that the usual amendment be made in this case. I move to amend by striking out the words "death of her husband" and inserting "from the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

FRANK S. SOWERS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5808) to rerate the pension of Frank S. Sowers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to rerate the pension of Frank S. Sowers, formerly a first lieutenant in the Third Regiment of Ohio Cavalry Volunteers; the said rerating to be made according to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3747) granting a rerating of pension to Frank S. Sowers, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

Sowers was discharged on account of disability June 2, 1863, and applied for pension September 21, 1878. His claim was allowed April 9, 1879, at one-fourth of total from date of discharge, and at three-fourths of total from November 13, 1878, the date upon which claimant was first examined by a Pension Office surgeon. He immediately applied for increase, and was allowed total pension $17 per month, in accordance with the rank, that of first lieutenant and quartermaster of the Third Ohio Cavalry Volunteers. The disability for which pensioned is chronic diarrhea. He asks that he be allowed total pension from date of discharge.

Under the practice of the Pension Office a less rating than that made by the first medical examination is usually given in cases of progressive disability for the period intervening between the date of discharge and the date of the first medical examination. The surgeon who first examined this soldier rated the disability at total, while the examination under the claim for increase, following closely upon the original adjudication of the case, showed a still greater disability.

It would seem from the evidence on file that the pension should have been rated higher, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for the bill H. R. 3747, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to rerate the pension in his discretion. The necessity for the passage of the bill exists in the fact that the Secretary has the power to rerate pensions only in cases of gunshot wounds.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ISADOR ROHRER.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1237) granting a pension to Isador Rohrer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, to date from the time of his discharge from service, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isador Rohrer, late a private in Company H, Second Illinois Light Artillery, on account of injuries received in the military service of the United States, in the war of the rebellion, April 20, 1864.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1237) granting a pension to Isador Rohrer, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears from the evidence in the case filed in the Pension Office that the petitioner was a private in Company H, Second Illinois Light Artillery; enlisted September 15, 1861, and discharged July 29, 1865, and filed declaration for pension October 12, 1869, alleging "disability from an injury to left shoulder by the fall of his horse while on the Cumberland River, Tennessee, April 20, 1864. He was on his post in the night-time, his horse stepped in a hole and stumbled, throwing claimant over his head and injuring him as above, producing partial paralysis." In affidavit filed November 16, 1872, "that he was treated for injury by hospital surgeon at Clarksville, Tennessee; was not in general hospital."

The Pension Office (May 22, 1874) rejected the claim on the ground—

"No record of alleged injury; inability to furnish the testimony of a surgeon or medical testimony showing condition at date of discharge."

The Adjutant-General reports:

"Roll for May and June, 1862, covering date of alleged disability, says: 'Absent on sick furlough.'"

* * * * * * *

The Surgeon-General reports:

"The regimental register for Company H not on file."

The petitioner's captain, Henry C. Whitemore, says, in affidavit filed November 16, 1872:

"Claimant, while in the line of his duty, while on a scouting expedition on White Oak Creek, between Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers, on or about August 8, 1864, was accidentally thrown from his horse, falling on his left shoulder, and receiving a severe injury of his shoulder at that time."

Lieutenant James Eckdale confirms his statement, and also says when he first knew claimant in the Army he was in good health and sound in body to all appearance.

Edward Clapham, M. D., late surgeon Seventh Michigan Veteran Volunteer Infantry, in affidavit, (filed November 16, 1872,) says:

"I have examined claimant. He is still suffering from an injury received on a scouting expedition on White Oak Creek, between the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers; his horse getting his foot into a hole, he was thrown violently on his left shoulder, giving rise to but slight inconvenience at the time, but proving subsequently much more painful, and eventuating in partial paralysis of the left shoulder arm, and undoubted injury to the circumflex nerve, part of the brachial plexus of nerves, which chiefly govern the movements of the deltoid muscles and shoulder arm; and, having spent all his means in medical advice, presents himself for admission into the Soldiers' Home, for which I cordially recommend him as a very proper recipient of the bounties of the institution.

"ED. CLAPHAM,

"Formerly Surgeon Seventh Michigan Veteran Volunteers,

"Professor of Anatomy, Medical College, Keokuk, Iowa."

J. L. Wood, M. D., (filed April 23, 1873,) testifies he "has treated claimant for injury to left arm and shoulder for nine months during the year 1872."

Thomas McEwen, M. D., (filed December 15, 1873,) says that "during the year 1873 he has examined claimant, and finds that he has diseased shoulder, giving rise to neuralgia, which is aggravated by damp weather. His disability is of a permanent nature."

A. B. Allen, M. D., (filed December 15, 1873,) says that "during the year 1873 he has treated claimant for neuralgia, and believes that the predisposing cause is from wounded trunk of some of the nerves of the left shoulder; that shoulder is much smaller than the other."

The petitioner states, (filed April 28, 1873:)

"All physicians to whom he applied for treatment having told him that it was unnecessary, that he could not be cured, excepting Dr. Wood. That after his discharge Dr. Cooper treated him for a short time for his injury, and said he could not be cured. He has made every effort to find Dr. Cooper, but cannot do so."

The petitioner has been twice before the examining surgeons of the Pension Office, and their certificates are included here, namely:

J. B. Samuel, M. D., Orleans, Morgan County, Illinois, June, 1872, who says:

"He is three-quarters incapacitated; disability uncertain as to time; his present condition was caused by a fall from a horse, the left shoulder becoming badly strained, which has resulted in the injury of upward and backward motion of the arm, which renders him unable to do hard work without producing considerable pain, and increasing in some degree the paralysis, which is only slight; the arm has lessened somewhat in size."

Joseph O. Hamilton, M. D., ex surgeon, Jerseyville, Jersey County, Illinois, April 1, 1874, says:

"One-half disability; indefinite duration; rheumatism of the deltoid trapezius and supraspinatus, causing stiffness and debility of the above-named muscles."

It may be well to note here the fact that the petitioner says he was "treated by hospital surgeon at Clarksville, Tennessee," and the Surgeon-General reports, "The regimental register for Company H not on file." It is therefore very probable that the claimant's statement is correct.

Your committee are of the opinion that this is a meritorious case. The claimant's allegations are substantiated in every important particular. While he does not prove clearly continuous treatment from time of discharge to the time he was examined in 1872 and 1873, by Dr. Wood and Dr. McEwen, yet they found him suffering from the identical injury received in the service, aggravated by time, and more severe than when treated for it originally. Dr. Samuels, ex-surgeon, Pension Office, finds it still existing and rates him for it.

Your committee therefore report favorably upon the claim and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1237) granting a pension to Isador Rohrer.

Amend as follows, namely: To strike out of lines 4 and 5 the words "to date from the time of his discharge from the service."

The amendment recommended by the committee, to strike out in lines 4 and 5 the words "to date from the time of his discharge from service," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALBAN H. NIXON.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5703) to increase the pension of Alban H. Nixon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Alban H. Nixon, late captain of Company K, Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers, to the sum of $36 per month, and to pay him a pension at said rate from and after the passage of this act.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 5703, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

Alban H. Nixon enlisted as a private in the Third Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers on the 18th day of April, 1861, and was honorably discharged from that regiment on the 30th day of June, 1861. He immediately began recruiting for the Eighty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and enlisted as a private in that regiment. On the 3d of March, 1862, he was made second lieutenant of that regiment; subsequently he became first lieutenant, and on the 3d day of May, 1863, he was promoted to captain. He was honorably discharged from this service on the 15th day of November, 1864, having lost his arm at Coal Harbor, Virginia, on the 1st day of June of said year. While serving as above he participated in seventeen battles and was seven times wounded, twice severely. He lost his left arm, as above stated, at the battle of Coal Harbor, and it was first amputated on the 9th of July, 1864. A second operation was performed on the 10th day of October, 1864, and on the 15th day of February, 1865, Dr. D. W. Bliss, of Washington, District of Columbia, performed still another operation, and took one of the bones of the forearm away from the elbow-joint, which leaves the elbow-joint perfectly stiff and useless. A wound was received by him at the battle of Mine Run, Virginia, which, to a considerable extent, disables his right arm.

This soldier is now pensioned at $30 per month. He asks for an increase to $36 per month. The committee believe he ought to have $30 per month, and recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "six," in line 6 of said bill, and then ask that it pass.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out "thirty-six" before the word "dollars" and insert "thirty," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

THOMAS M'MANNUS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4966) for the relief of Thomas McMannus.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Thomas McMannus, late of Company A, One hundred and fifty-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, at the rate of $8 per month, commencing at the date of the discharge of said solddier.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4966) for the relief of Thomas McMannus, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

Thomas McMannus was a private soldier in the Third Regiment of Pennsylvania Artillery, (One hundred and fifty-second Volunteers,) and as such made an excellent record. At the time of his enlistment he was a person of unusual physical strength and vigor. He is now, and has been ever since his discharge, totally disabled for the performance of manual labor, and has been the object of the charity of two sisters, who are illy able to support him. He was seriously hurt while in the service of the United States, and his application for a pension was refused upon the ground that he was not in the line of duty at the time he received the injury. His disability is clearly traceable to this injury received while in the service; and the proof establishes every fact necessary to entitle him to a pension, beyond any possibility of dispute, except the fact that he was in the line of duty. Here there is a conflict of evidence.

At the time he was injured he was on detached service with what was known as Graham's Naval Brigade, this soldier having been detailed because of his great physical strength. At the moment of the injury there was no one present but his assailants. He was struck upon the head with some hard and heavy weapon and knocked senseless to the ground, and afterward beaten and kicked so as to produce the permanent injury as stated above. This happened in the city of Fredericksburgh, Virginia, in the early part of March, 1865. This naval brigade at that time made a raid upon said city and captured a large quantity of tobacco and loaded it upon the boats. After this was done this soldier while in the said city was attacked as aforesaid and received the serious injuries which have been described.

The evidence as to his being in the line of duty is somewhat conflicting; but the most reasonable statement, and that upon which your committee prefer to rely, is that made by one J. W. Hague, who makes his from a diary kept at the time, and who did not testify in this soldier's behalf until since the Pension Office rejected this claim. He states that the men, after they had loaded the tobacco they had found upon the boats, were detailed to go over the city to look for other tobacco which was supposed to be concealed there, and that McMannus was so engaged at the time he received said injury. With this view of the evidence, which, to some extent at least, reconciles the conflict in the testimony, your committee do not hesitate to report favorably upon this bill, and recommend that it pass with this amendment: Strike out all after the word "volunteers," in line 6 of said bill, and insert these words: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment recommended by the committee, to strike out at the end of the bill the words "at the rate of $8 per month, commencing at the date of the discharge of said soldier," and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM M. MEREDITH.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2877) for the relief of William M. Meredith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to date the application of William M. Meredith, late a captain in the Seventieth Indiana Volunteers, for a pension as filed with the Commissioner of Pensions on the 5th day of June, 1880, and that in the adjudication of his said claim for a pension his declaration be treated as filed on said date.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2877) for the relief of William M. Meredith, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

Petitioner makes oath that on or about the 24th day of June, 1879, he executed a declaration for invalid pension before the clerk of the court of Marion County, Indiana, which he intrusted to his attorney, Benjamin D. House, of Indianapolis, Indiana, to be mailed to the Commissioner of Pensions.

Benjamin D. House swears that William M. Meredith intrusted him with an application for invalid pension for mailing to the Committee on Pensions; that on the following day the same was inclosed by him in an envelope, securely sealed and plainly directed to Hon. John A. Bentley, Commissioner of Pensions, at Washington, District of Columbia. Affiant remembers his action in the matter from the fact that the said William M. Meredith was unable to walk at the time, except by the aid of crutches.

This declaration, however, never reached the Pension Office, and its loss was not discovered by the claimant until after the expiration of the limitation for the filing of pension claims under the arrears act.

The Commissioner of Pensions, in a letter to this committee, states that testimony has been brought before his office, satisfactory to him, that Meredith's declaration was mailed in sufficient time to have reached his office prior to July 1, 1880, had it not been lost in the mails.

Meredith was captain of Company E, Seventeenth Indiana Volunteers, and claims pension on account of hernia contracted in the service. So far as lay in his power he complied fully with the requirements of the law by properly executing a declaration for pension and placing the same, through his attorney, in the possession of the Government for safe delivery at the bureau charged with its consideration in time sufficient to carry with it title to arrears under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1879. Its loss in the mails was through no fault of the claimant, but must be charged directly to the Government. Unless the relief asked for be granted the claimant will be deprived of the pension for the period intervening between the date of his discharge and the date upon which a second declaration reached the Pension Office.

The committee is clearly of opinion that the execution and mailing to the proper office of a declaration for pension by the petitioner, as well as its loss while in the hands of the Government, is fully established, and that such loss should work no hardship on him, and therefore reports favorably on the bill and asks that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JACOB HUMBLE.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5809) for the relief of Jacob Humble.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to adjudicate the pension claim of Jacob Humble, late a private in Company F, Sixth Indiana Cavalry, (Seventy-first Volunteers,) as if the same had been duly filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions on the 5th day of August, 1879.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the House bill No. 2256, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

Jacob Humble was a private in company F, Sixth Indiana, and served a three years' enlistment as such. Near Atlanta, Georgia, he was taken prisoner in July, 1864, and was confined at Andersonville and in other prisons until March, 1865, when he was paroled and ordered to the prison camp at Camp Chase, Ohio. While there he met with a severe accident by the falling of his bunk, situated in the barracks at said camp, by which his spine was injured, and from which he has never recovered. For six years past he has been unable to stand and has not left his bed. On or about the 1st day of August, 1879, he made out an application for an invalid pension on account of said injury, and delivered the same to his neighbor, Dr. William Williams, to be by him delivered to his attorneys, McKnight & Johnson, at Spencer, Indiana, with instructions to file the same at once in the Pension Office. These papers did not reach the Pension Office, and the said Humble was not informed of that fact until in the year 1881, about two years after he had, as he supposed, complied with the requirements of the law by which he would be entitled to the arrears.

Humble files his affidavit, stating that he made out his application on or about the 1st day of August, 1879, and delivered the same as aforesaid to Dr. William Williams, to be delivered by him to his aforesaid attorneys at Spencer. Franklin R. Drake swears that he saw said Humble at said time so deliver said application to said Williams. Dr. Williams swears that he did on said day so deliver the said application with said instructions; that he saw one of said attorneys, Alex. McKnight, at once place said declaration in an envelope, seal it, and start in the direction of the post-office, and in a few minutes thereafter the said McKnight informed him that he had mailed the same. McKnight testifies that he did at that time duly stamp and regularly mail said declaration as he was instructed to do; that it was plainly directed to the Commissioner of Pensions, Washington, District of Columbia, and that neither he nor his partner were informed that the same had not reached the commissioner aforesaid until in the year 1881.

It appears to be as certain as human testimony can make any fact that this declaration was lost in the mails in some way; that the soldier was not in any fault; that he complied with every requirement of the law; that it was then notorious that the adjudication of pension cases was greatly delayed, and for that reason he might rightly have remained silent for so long a time, expecting that his claim would be settled in due course of business in said office when it could be reached; that this soldier was then in such a condition of physical health that he could not leave his bed, and in fact so remains. For all these reasons your committee believe that he is entitled to the relief he asks, and therefore report the accompanying substitute bill, and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

LEWIS LEWIS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3761) granting a pension to Lewis Lewis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lewis Lewis, late a private in Company F, Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3761) granting a pension to Lewis Lewis, beg leave to make the following report:

Lewis Lewis was a private in Company F, Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and claims a pension on the ground that he received a bayonet wound in the groin, which caused permanent hernia, while in the line of duty at Nashville, Tennessee, September 28, 1862, said wound being inflicted in a quarrel with the provost guard at that place. The ground on which the application was rejected by the Pension Office was that there was not sufficient evidence to show that the disability was incurred strictly in the line of duty.

Dr. Charles B. Gillespie, who was captain of Company F, Seventy-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, in his sworn statement before Special Agent M. C. Fosnes, at Freeport, Pennsylvania, on June 2, 1881, says:

"Lewis was sent up town by Lieutenant Torbett to post some letters for members of the company. He asked for a pass, but the lieutenant told him it was not necessary, being train guard, and he therefore started without a pass. He had performed his errand and was returning to the depot when accosted by a provost guard belonging to the First Pennsylvania, who demanded his pass. He repeated what Lieutenant Torbett had told him in regard to a pass not being necessary. The provost guard then attempted to arrest him. He resisted or tried to get away, and a scuffle ensued in which the guard knocked him down and stabbed him in the abdomen.

"This was the version of the affair told affiant the next day by members of the company, and which he always believed to be true, but cannot say who told him."

In regard to the claim that the applicant was suffering from rupture before entering the Army, Dr. Gillespie says that on the day following the wounding of Lewis he visited him in the hospital and found him suffering from a punctured wound in the abdomen. The wound had been sewed up, so that affiant could not testify as to the depth, &c., but he examined the man carefully, and is absolutely certain that he was free from hernia at that time. When Lewis returned to his company he complained of his wound, and on examination it was found that his bowels protruded through the gash made by the bayonet, and that there was a well defined ventral hernia then existing.

There are other affidavits of a similar nature in regard to the wounding of Lewis, one stating, however, that he was probably drunk at the time of the fuss.

M. C. Fosnes, special examining agent, says:

"This is one of those cases in which the testimony of eye-witnesses is not obtainable."

And further on in his report:

"The applicant is a simple and ignorant man. Everybody speaks of him as honest and conscientious, and that is the way he impressed me. Indeed, I consider him both morally and mentally incapable of telling a lie and sticking to it under cross-examination. I questioned him very fully and carefully, but he showed no hesitation, uncertainty, or confusion at any time. So far as I could judge, the man told the truth."

The applicant is now an old man, being sixty-seven years of age, and is entirely unable to earn a living for himself and wife.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JESSE F. PHARES.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 915) granting a pension to Jesse F. Phares.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse F. Phares, late a scout under General McClellan.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 915) granting a pension to Jesse F. Phares, have carefully examined the same, and report favorably the Senate report in this case:

"That they find the facts of the case are fully stated in the report of the Committee on Pensions made to the Senate during the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress (S. R. No. 228) but that they do not agree with the conclusion arrived at in that report. It also appears that the Senate at the same session, disagreed with the report of the committee, and passed the bill granting a pension to the claimant.

"Your committee recommend the passage of the bill."

So much of the Senate report in which the committee concur as states the facts in this case is as follows:

"The facts in the case are few and clearly proven. At the outbreak of the rebellion the claimant was a resident of Randolph County, in the State of Virginia; that he entered the service of the Government about the month of June, 1861, as a scout, serving under Generals McClellan, Milroy, Kelly, and others, and by reason of his intimate knowledge of the country and his intelligence, zeal, and daring, rendering very valuable service to the Union cause. In April, 1863, the confederate General Imboden advanced upon the Union forces at Beverly, West Virginia, commanded by Colonel George R. Latham, commanding Fifth West Virginia Cavalry. In the advance, Phares, who was then on duty outside the Union pickets, was surprised by a party of confederate troops, and refusing to halt when ordered was shot through the body, but retained his saddle until he reached the Union lines. The following are extracts from the affidavits of Colonel George R. Latham, Fifth Regiment West Virginia Cavalry, (Union,) and of Lieutenant-Colonel Elihu Hutton, Twentieth Regiment Virginia Cavalry, (confederate.)

"Colonel Latham says:

"'On the 23d day of April, 1863, I was in command of the Federal forces stationed at Beverly, West Virginia, and said Phares, then scouting outside my picket, was cut off by a party of the enemy then advancing under General Imboden to attack me, and in endeavoring to dash past them was badly wounded by a musket-ball passing through his body, through the lungs, from the effects of which he is almost wholly disabled, and is failing rapidly in strength and general health. Though so badly wounded he retained his saddle until he reached my pickets, and gave the first intimation that I had of the advance of the enemy. I was compelled to evacuate Beverly and Phares fell into the hands of the enemy. He had at the time several thousand dollars' worth of goods and personal property, all of which was taken from him, leaving him and his family in very destitute and distressed circumstances, from which they have been unable to recover.'

"Lieutenant-Colonel Hutton says:

"'During the late civil war I was lieutenant-colonel of the Twentieth Regiment Virginia Cavalry, (confederate service,) and served principally on the West Virginia frontier, where it was well known who were acting as scouts and guides for the Federal forces in that vicinity, and said Jesse F. Phares was well known to be one of the most active and dangerous scouts and guides operating against us. His knowledge of the country was thorough; he was smart, daring, and vigilant, and capable of great endurance. In consequence of the knowledge we possessed of this fact, every possible exertion was made on our part to capture him, but without success until the 23d day of April, 1863, when General Imboden advanced upon the Federal forces then stationed at Beverly, commanded by Colonel George R. Latham.

"'In order to cut off all scout that might be outside the Federal pickets, we sent by night a party of men through the woods to gain the road near the outside Federal picket post before daylight on the morning of April 23, 1863. About daylight said Phares, who was thus cut off, approached said party of men on horseback and was ordered to halt, but dashed forward, and passed the men, when he was fired upon by them, one ball taking effect, passing through his body—through the lungs—from the effects of which he is now almost wholly disabled. He retained his seat, however, until he reached the Federal picket and gave information of our advance.

"'Beverly was evacuated the same day by the Federal forces and occupied by the confederates, and Phares fell into our hands.

"'He was cared for by me personally about fifteen days, but a large amount of goods, general merchandise, groceries, &c., household furniture, and other personal property, to the value of several thousand dollars, fell into confederate hands and was used or destroyed by them, leaving him and his family in very destitute circumstances, in which condition, principally in consequence of his disability, they remain to this time. He has four children living, and one, his oldest, a daughter, died of consumption in 1870, induced by hardships and exposure, and his wife is worn down by care and labor.

"'Said Phares is about forty-three years of age, and has been for several years failing rapidly in physical strength in consequence of the wound above referred to.'

"J. R. Blair, an examining surgeon for the Pension Office in the State of West Virginia, certifies, under date of December 24, 1879, that he has carefully examined Phares and finds 'that his left hip was entered by a musket-ball, which passed upward through the region of the lower part of the left lung and out near the stomach. The effect of the wound is to weaken and partly paralyze the entire left side, and, in my judgment, produces at least a two-thirds disability, which will increase."

The Senate bill and report are adopted by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and reported to the House with the recommendation that said Senate bill pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET KEARNS.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1103) granting a pension to Margaret Kearns.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Kearns, mother of James Kearns, late a sergeant of Company G, Ninety-fourth New York Infantry.

The report of the committee is as follows:

This claim was before the Forty-sixth Congress, and was reported favorably upon by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Your committee adopt that report, which is as follows:

"It appears from an examination of the papers in the case on file in the Pension Office that the petitioner is the mother of James Kearns, sergeant Company G, Ninety-fourth New York Volunteers, who died July 20, 1864, at Petersburgh, Virginia, of wounds, at the time serving out a re-enlistment.

"The petitioner filed application May 18, 1868, which was rejected November 7, 1871, by the Pension Office, on the ground, 'As claimant was not dependent upon her son at his death, the claim is rejected.'

"There is a long affidavit filed by the claimant, and a large number of persons testify in the case. From them we glean these facts: that at the time of the soldier's death his mother was in a great measure dependent upon him for support, as her husband was suffering with rheumatism and weak eyes, as shown by L. McKay, M. D., June 3, 1869, who says he has 'this day made a careful examination of Dennis Kearns, father of James Kearns, who was a sergeant in Company G, Ninety-fourth New York Volunteers, and who died in the service.' Deponent further says that he has attended and prescribed for said Dennis Kearns for over eight years last passed; that during said time he has treated said Kearns for fever and ague, rheumatism, and weak eyes—the two latter he is now suffering—and chronic troubles on account of old age and infirmities.

"Eliza O. Grady testifies that she has been acquainted with claimant's family over thirteen years, and that before enlistment James Kearns was a shoemaker and worked at his trade, and that she knows of her own knowledge that he contributed what was necessary out of his earnings to the support of his father and mother.

"Margaret Ryan, another neighbor, corroborates the evidence of last witness. Mrs. Margaret McNearey and Ann McMeniman, in a joint affidavit, testify substantially to the same facts.

"There is an original letter among the papers from the deceased soldier, dated Rappahannock Station, August 18, 1863, addressed:

"'Dear parents: This day, by the chaplain of our regiment, I send you $20 by Adams Express.'

"The soldier's remittances seem to have helped the old people to get a small domicile for their declining years."

In view of the facts as developed by the evidence, your committee believe that the petitioner was in a great measure dependent upon her deceased son, and therefore report favorably upon her prayer, and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1103) granting a pension to Margaret Kearns.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMELINE PINK.

The next pension business on the Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 4914) granting a pension to Emeline Pink.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emeline Pink, widow of Charles Pink, late of Company B, New York State Heavy Artillery, and who served as a soldier in the Union Army during the rebellion.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom the bill (H. R. No. 4914) granting a pension to Emeline Pink was referred, beg leave to submit the following report:

The Claimant, Emeline Pink, is the widow of Charles Pink, late corporal of Company B, Sixth New York Heavy Artillery. The deceased soldier was appointed corporal September 15, 1862. He was wounded at the battle of Spottsylvania, Virginia, May 19, 1864, and was mustered out July 3, 1865. He was then transferred to the Veteran Reserve Corps for gunshot wound in the back, the ball entering the right hip, passing inward and backward, and emerging through the upper part of the corresponding nates. In May, 1864, after fatiguing marches and heavy duty for several days, and being exposed to the sun, the deceased was overcome with the heat, and his brain became affected. He was also afflicted with noises in the head, pressure upon the brain, and deafness; acted in an abstracted manner and showed symptoms of sunstroke. No improvement appeared in his case, and he died about July 12, 1866. His death was occasioned immediately by being upon the track of the Harlem Railroad, and being struck and killed by a locomotive. At the inquest the jury stated as follows:

"The jury further believes that the said Charles Pink was at the time of the accident laboring under some derangement of mind."

The deceased soldier was in good health and strength when he entered the service. His habits were good, and no indication exists that the accident occurred by reason of intoxication.

The deceased never made application for a pension, and no application has been presented to Congress in behalf of his widow previous to this one.

It is apparent that the accidental death of the deceased was the result of derangement of the mind, arising from the effect of the sunstroke before mentioned, and was the direct effect of the injury received by the soldier while in the line of his duty.

This committee are therefore of opinion that the widow should be granted a pension, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARTHA WESTERVELT.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1098) granting a pension to Martha Westervelt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martha Westervelt, mother of William Westervelt, formerly a private in Company K, Third New York Cavalry.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1098) granting a pension to Martha Westervelt, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears from an examination of the papers in the case on file in the Pension Office, before your committee, that the petitioner is the mother of William Westervelt, late a private in Company K, Third New York Cavalry, and who died while a prisoner at Andersonville, Georgia, on or about July 23, 1864, as alleged in the mother's application for pension. The application was rejected by the Pension Office June 24, 1869, on the ground, "soldier not in line of duty when captured, (and died when in rebel prison;) got drunk on apple-jack; was left on the road by his officers, and captured by the enemy."

"The certificate of Captain Samuel C. Pierce, of claimant's company, says William Westervelt was with his company on a march made about the 7th day of May, 1864, from City Point to rear of Richmond. That on the 10th of May the company was at Coal Fields Station, on the Danville Railroad. That while the company was engaged in tearing up the track and destroying the buildings the said Westervelt was seized with sudden sickness. That immediately after the track of the road was destroyed the regiment was ordered to move, and there was no means of bringing said soldier with the command, and I was obliged to order him left at a house near the road. This is the only thing I know personally about the case, but I have been informed that said soldier was afterward seen in prison at Andersonville, Georgia, and Florence, South Carolina, and that he died while in prison.

"The Adjutant-General's report says 'left in the road, by order, on account of drunkenness, near Coal Field, West Virginia.'

"The deceased soldier was enrolled January 5, 1864. The case shows that his intoxication at the time of his capture was his first offense of the kind while in service. He died leaving no widow or children or father surviving him.

"The evidence in the case is conclusive that the petitioner was dependent upon the soldier for her support; and she had been supported by him for a long time before he entered the service.

"There is positive proof in this case that the deceased soldier was a very steady man previous to his enlistment, and that he was captured just after doing duty (if not at the precise hour) with his comrades in destroying the enemy's property. He may have succumbed to the insidious effects of 'apple-jack' at the time mentioned, but he was proven to be, ordinarily, a very steady man. He was captured, suffered a lingering death as a prisoner of war, and his aged, widowed mother needs, in lieu of his services, his country's bounty to help her declining years."

Your committee conclude to report favorably upon the prayer, and to recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1098) "granting a pension to Martha Westervelt.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LAURINDA G. CUMMINGS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4345) granting an increase of pension to Laurinda G. Cummings.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Laurinda G. Cummings, widow of Brevet Brigadier-General Gilbert W. Cummings, and pay her the sum of $60 per month instead of the pension she now receives; but nothing in this act shall entitle the said Laurinda G. Cummings to arrears of pension.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The claimant, Laurinda Garfield Cummings, aged 54 years, is the widow of Gilbert W. Cummings, who was mustered into the service as colonel of the Fifty-first Regiment Illinois Volunteers, February 14, 1862. He was in action April 30, 1862, and from that date until October 30 was absent on sick-leave. He resigned in 1862.

He was brevetted brigadier-general "for gallant and meritorious services during the operations before and capture of the enemy's forces at Island No. 10, in the Mississippi River."

In March, 1862, said Colonel Cummings, with his regiment, in the line of his duty, marched from Bertrand, Missouri, to New Madrid, marching from Sykeston about twenty miles in a drenching rain, and during four days said regiment, with said colonel, were without tents or cooked food, and exposed to two rainstorms of twelve to fifteen hours each; and during the first ten days of April, 1862, said colonel, with his regiment, went to the Kentucky side of the Mississippi River to intercept the confederates' retreat from Island No. 10, and again were without equipage or cooking utensils, and passed one night in a cold, drenching rain, and often wading; and after and in consequence of this, said Colonel Cummings became sick, and remained with his regiment sick for some time and then left upon sick-leave, so much disabled that he had to be transported upon a cot.

Said Colonel Cummings was a well and sound man when he entered the service. He died in March, 1877, of paralysis.

General Eleazer A. Paine states that he commanded the division in which said Cummings acted as brigade commander April, 1862, and that said Cummings was in fact the officer who captured Island No. 10, April 6, 1862, although the surrender was made to another officer. It also appears that said Cummings also suffered other severe exposure about the same date as that above detailed.

The letter of resignation of said Cummings is dated September 12, 1862, and August 1, 1862, the post-surgeon, B. M. Vickers, certifies that he had carefully examined said colonel and found that he had suffered greatly from a long course of fever and dysentery and that the latter had become chronic, and suffered great general debility, weakness of the spine, and had little use of his lower limbs.

The said Cummings continued to suffer from said debility as long as he lived. He had attacks of fever, continued partial loss of use of the legs, his spine became affected, and also the head, so as to produce mental derangement; became subject to cerebro-spinal oxis, was unfitted for all manual labor, had several attacks of paralysis, in one of which he died—all of which resulted from the strain and exposure before detailed, in March and April, 1862.

The said Cummings received no pension in his lifetime. His widow receives a pension of $30 per month. She is a confirmed invalid, and testifies that her debility was occasioned by her hard service in taking care of her husband during his aforesaid debility. There is no prospect of her becoming in better health. She has a chronic disease of the spine, and her condition is such that she needs the continual care of an attendant. She has also dependent upon her a daughter of her said husband, who is a partial invalid.

The husband's protracted illness used up the property possessed by him, the applicant is very poor, and the $30 per month is insufficient to support her.

Your committee are of the opinion that, considering the valuable services of the deceased husband, and the long and expensive sickness which he suffered, and especially the fact that he bore that expense himself, without receiving a pension, and the fact that the present disability of applicant is nearly total and is permanent, and was probably occasioned by her labors in taking care of her husband, further relief should be granted to applicant, and they recommend the passage of the bill, amending the same by striking out the word "sixty" in the seventh line and inserting the word "fifty" in lieu thereof.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH T. DUBOIS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to Elizabeth T. Dubois.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth T. Dubois, widow of Theodore B. Dubois, late a volunteer acting lieutenant-commander in the naval service of the United States.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The bill in this case provides only for placing the name of the petitioner upon the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws. In the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress this application came before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and the following report was made, namely:

"It appears from the evidence in the case in the Pension Office that the petitioner is the widow of T. B. Dubois, late an acting volunteer lieutenant-commander in the United States Navy, who served as follows:

"October 28, 1861, appointed an acting master and ordered to report to Flag-Officer Goldsborough; commanded the Albatross; June 5, 1863, promoted for gallant conduct in battle to acting volunteer lieutenant, still commanding Albatross.

"November 26, 1864, promoted to acting volunteer lieutenant-commander.

"April 21, 1865, detached by Acting Rear-Admiral Thatcher, commanding West Gulf Squadron, and ordered to duty in saving public property from the Milwaukee and Osage, which were sunk by torpedoes in Mobile Bay.

"October 7, 1865, detached and granted leave of absence.

"February 6, 1866, he was honorably discharged, and died December 13, 1874, at Kings County lunatic asylum, New York."

Fleet Captain E. Simpson, United States Navy, writes to the deceased officer, under date of October 14, 1865:

"'Your satisfactory reports about the Althea and Osage are at hand, and orders have been sent for a batch of engineers to report to you for duty on board the Osage; this is on the supposition that you will be able to take command of the vessel that you, and you alone, have rescued from her watery grave. Your orders have not been sent, because I desire the authority of your surgeon before I order you to the trying duty. When the Tritonia returns here I expect her to bring your report as to your physical efficiency, when your orders will be issued.'

"Admiral H. K. Thatcher, under date of August 10, 1865, writes:

"'Your services at Mobile are fully appreciated by me, and will be duly represented to the Department.'

"And again, August 11, 1865:

"'You have satisfied yourself that the Osage is your own, and I heartily congratulate you on your success.'

"The widow's application for pension was filed December 13, 1874, alleging 'that in 1865, Captain Theodore B. Dubois (her husband) fell through the hatchway of the Osage, then lying in Mobile Bay, and that he then broke three of his ribs, and, as has since been shown, injured his brain, and shattered permanently his previously healthful and remarkably vigorous system. That a short time after his accident he apparently regained his health and vigor. During the year in which he resigned from the naval service he secured a half-interest in the ship Minetauka, believing himself to be still able to command a vessel. This venture, because of his trouble, which was growing upon him at that time, became a total loss.' The petitioner cites other cases of a similar nature, and adduces a number of responsible and reliable witnesses in support of her declaration.

"The 'brief' in the Pension Office in the case shows that the examiner in the office had allowed the claim at $30 per month, commencing December 13, 1874, the date of officer's death, and $2 per month additional for each child. This seems to have been afterward changed, and the word 'admitted' struck out and 'reject' written over it. Under cause of death, 'softening of the brain,' is written 'rejected by medical division January 31, 1876,' and the rejection affirmed by board of appeal.

"Dr. R. Lautenbach swears that he was an acting volunteer assistant surgeon during 1865, and was stationed at Mobile, and while so acting was acquainted with Theodore B. Dubois, who was injured during said year while engaged in raising the Osage, and while suffering from said injuries witness treated him as follows: 'At his quarters on the eastern shore of Mobile, Alabama, for a fracture of ribs, contusion, and shock, received while raising the monitor Osage. The injury was received between September and October, 1865. The quarters might be called a hospital, as I established a hospital in a house adjoining his quarters. This hospital was kept in operation until Captain Dubois was convalescent, when the sailors were transferred to their respective vessels. Captain Dubois was sound in body prior to the injury, and was often visited by Admiral Thatcher and Captain E. Simpson.'

"Surgeon-General reports Dr. Lautenbach 'was on duty as stated in his affidavit, but the sick reports for third quarter 1865 are not on file.'

"Captain E. Simpson, United States Navy, swears that 'Captain Dubois was employed in raising vessels in Mobile Bay in 1865, and saved a large amount of property for the United States Government. While so employed he had a very severe fall, which resulted in some ribs being broken and other injuries. Captain Dubois was a most valuable officer, and could be relied on in any emergency, and his widow richly deserves a pension.'

"Edwin R. Lowe swears that he was 'a submarine engineer and diver, and was employed by Captain Dubois to help raise the Osage in Mobile Bay, and while so doing Captain Dubois fell through the battle-hatch of the Osage and was thereby severely injured by striking his ribs against the combings of the hatch, thereby fracturing his ribs and receiving severe injuries. Witness was at the time on board the vessel, and saw Captain Dubois a minute after he was hurt and had been carried on board the Althea, which he commanded.'

"Dr. Andrew Otterson swears that he 'knew the claimant for twenty years, and always considered him sound and able-bodied until he was injured by a fall while in the Navy, and at this time he is of unsound mind and totally unfit to take care of his property or his family, and is now (October, 1874) an inmate of the Kings County lunatic asylum. Captain Dubois is not a dissipated man or drinking man. Affiant was his family physician.'

"Dr. Stephen B. Doty testifies substantially to the facts as set forth by the previous witness, and declares 'that he was a man of good habits.'

"Dr. W. H. Randolph testifies that Captain Dubois was under his care in 1870, 'suffering from cerebral disease, having disordered vision and partial loss of hearing. It is affiant's opinion the result of fall in the service.'

"Dr. Norvin Green, vice-president of the International Ocean Telegraph Company, testifies that 'Captain Dubois was in the employ of said company in 1873. I soon discovered a sad defect in memory and wandering mind; soon after he became insane. The symptoms and results to the mind, and finally death, were such as might have resulted from a blow or fall on the head some years previously.'

"The full text of the rejection by the Pension Office is as follows:

"'Immediate cause of death, softening of the brain. Remote cause, unknown; but not the result of any injury received while in the service.

"'Reject.

"'N. F. GRAHAM,
"'Medical Examiner.

"'Approved January 29, 1876.

"'T. B. HOOD,
"'Medical Referee.'

"Your committee are of the opinion that T. B. Dubois, while in the line of duty in the United States naval service, incurred the disability which eventually terminated in loss of reason and loss of life, and that the petitioner (his widow) is entitled to a place on the pension-rolls of the Government, in accordance with the provisions of the pension laws.

"Your committee have reached this conclusion after careful examination of the voluminous testimony found in the case. The character and standing of the witnesses, whose statements so fully explain and corroborate each other, make the chain of evidence complete in favor of the claim.

"The records of Surgeon-General's Office show that the returns for the last quarter of 1865 are not on file, but the surgeon who treated deceased testifies clearly to the occurrence and to treatment for the injury. Captain Simpson, his superior officer, testifies to the injury, and in his letter refers to it."

This committee adopt the foregoing report, and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1102) placing upon the pension-rolls the name of Elizabeth T. Dubois.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALICE M'MAHON.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 251) granting a pension to Alice McMahon, reported adversely.

Mr. BROWNE. I ask by unanimous consent that be passed over.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I prefer it should be acted on and sent into the House. It is a Senate bill. It was reported favorably in the Forty-sixth Congress, but action could not be had in the Senate. I have all the papers from the office of the Commissioner, and I think by a presentation of the case there can be no doubt the action of the Senate should be sustained.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alice McMahon, widow of the late Private Daniel McMahon, of Company L, Second New York Artillery Volunteers.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill S. No. 251, beg leave to report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass, for the reason that there is no proof that the soldier whose widow asks for a pension died from disease contracted in or consequent upon his service, but, on the contrary, did die four years after the war from acute pneumonia.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I ask now that the report of the Senate committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 251) granting a pension to Alice McMahon, having examined the same, report:

That the applicant, Alice McMahon, is widow of Daniel McMahon, who was a private in Company L, Second Regiment New York Heavy Artillery. Enlisted on the 9th of November, 1863, and mustered out with his company September 28, 1865. The soldier died March 12, 1869, never having applied for a pension, and claimant filed an application for a pension September 4, 1878, which was rejected October 25, 1879, upon the ground that the disease of which the soldier died, acute pneumonia, originated subsequent to the soldier's discharge.

The Army records do not show sickness or disability in the Army, and no medical treatment of the soldier is shown until February 20, 1869, (the commencement of his last sickness;) but it is shown by the testimony of neighbors, who appear to be credible, that at the time of his discharge he was suffering from an asthmatic difficulty, and that his lungs were weak; that he was emaciated and had a cough, and that such continued to be his condition, in greater or less degree, until the attack of pneumonia, which terminated fatally. Dr. M. C. West, who attended him in his last illness, testifies "that said McMahon had been a sufferer by reason of asthma, his lungs being in a weak and unhealthy condition, which predisposed him to the attack of pneumonia, and that he has reason to believe that the patient would have survived the attack of pneumonia had it not been that his strength had previously been so exhausted by asthma." In view of these facts the committee is of opinion that the applicant has an equitable claim to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, after it shall have been amended by adding to the same the words, "her pension to commence from the passage of this act."

Mr. PRESCOTT. There is no question, Mr. Chairman, in this case but what this soldier discharged his duty faithfully and well. The entire proofs in the case are complete in regard to all the matters, showing that he was actively in the service discharging all the duties required of a soldier. The proofs in the case, filed with the Commissioner, do show that which has not been spoken of in either of the reports, but which is a fact to be taken in connection with this case, that on the 29th of July, 1865, immediately preceding his discharge, he was one of those who was injured by a tornado which swept over this section of the country.

In connection with that, and to satisfy myself in reference to this case, I went to the public library and obtained from there the newspapers of that time; and I found in the daily Star a statement of the fact that on the 29th of July, 1865, there had occurred a tremendous tornado which had created considerable devastation in this city and the surrounding country and the camps in Virginia, where this man then was—Camp Corcoran, I think. The Star states that the storm which visited the city on Saturday last (the paper is dated Monday, July 31, 1865,) was the most violent known here in several years. That about three o'clock dense black clouds rolled up in the west and indicated the approach of an unusually severe gale.

It then goes on to say that the rain fell in torrents accompanied by hail; that awnings were blown down, trees uprooted, basements flooded, &c.; that damage was done to the White House; that the firm of Lockwood & Co., on the avenue, were damaged to the extent of $10,000; that show-windows were broken in by the force of the gale; that the street-railway track on F street was torn up and undermined; that shade-trees were uprooted or shattered; and that the windows in the Government Printing Office were broken in, being completely riddled by the hail; and also that many chimneys were blown down. The article then proceeds:

A number of camps on the Virginia side of the river suffered severely. Tents were blown over, and trees were uprooted and fell heavily upon the temporary residences of the soldiers. At Fort Corcoran, Virginia, the barracks used by the soldiers on duty there were blown down, thereby wounding nineteen soldiers, some seriously.

The article further shows that the storm in Virginia and Maryland bordering on the river was equally severe, destroying houses, fences, crops, uprooting trees, and generally spreading havoc in its course.

This is corroborative testimony of the facts alleged by this applicant, and if it be shown that by reason of this tornado this soldier has received an injury, he is certainly entitled to consideration. The facts in the case are as I have stated. This soldier was one of the nineteen injured, as mentioned in this article. He was injured in his side and hip; and I have a letter written by him immediately after this from the hospital, saying that he was so severely injured that he was placed in the hospital for medical treatment. Following upon that his discharge took place, some three months afterward. This was in July, and he appears to have been discharged in September following.

Mr. BROWNE. For what?

Mr. PRESCOTT. I cannot state. The discharge does not specify the cause.

Mr. McMILLIN. Might it not have been by reason of the expiration of his term?

Mr. PRESCOTT. I am not able to state that. It is possible that it is true.

Mr. McMILLIN. There is no statement that he was discharged for inability.

Mr. PRESCOTT. It does not so appear; I judge, however, that he was discharged at the expiration of his service, because in his letter he states that he was expecting that the regiment would be mustered out, and that he would receive his discharge and come home. But he writes this from the hospital. He was discharged on the 28th of September, and the injury was received on the 29th of July. At that time he was still in the hospital. The affidavits in the case are absolutely conclusive, without any contradiction in any form by any investigation that has been made. When he reached home he was suffering from the injury which he received to his lungs, and to such an extent that he was unable to perform any labor to which he had been accustomed. The affidavits show that he was so injured that he had from that time an asthmatic affection or trouble of his lungs which disabled him so that from that time until he died, in 1869, some four years afterward, he was not able to perform any duty.

It is shown that he had made, from time to time, attempts to work, but was not able to perform any labor, and could stand no exposure. He was one of the best accountants I ever saw; one of the best in our part of the State, and certainly one of the best men that left that section for the Army. I have stated that he died four years after that time—a little less than four years, three years and eight months—and the affidavits to which I have referred show that never for one moment's time from the date that he received the injury until he arrived home, and from that time to his death, was he able to perform any work. To be sure the affidavit of the doctor is that what finally killed him was an attack of acute pneumonia; but he further states that he was so reduced and weakened from the injury he received that he was not able to withstand the attack. His exact words are that he has "reason to believe that the patient would have survived the attack of pneumonia had it not been that his strength had previously been so exhausted by asthma." Now, he left a widow and one little boy, and the widow applied immediately for a pension, and for long years she has been trying to get a pension, but finally the Department rendered a decision in which they stated that the immediate cause was acute pneumonia, and not exposure or injury resulting from the service.

The doctor, however, as I have shown, says he would probably have recovered if it had not been for the injury from which he was suffering by reason of the tornado. As I have shown from the Star there is certainly strong grounds for the belief that injury was the result of his service. None of the facts in the case, I submit to the committee, present any feature by which there should be prejudice against this application, and it was so considered in the Senate. They reached a favorable report, and the bill passed the Senate and came here. I am informed by Mr. WADSWORTH, who reported the bill, that he took the report of the Commissioner, which states what has been already shown, and that the pension was refused by the committee on the ground therein specified, that the immediate active and final cause of his death was acute pneumonia.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this case is not one of those cases where the House should be willing to defraud this woman by a technicality if she is entitled to the pension, for it is defrauding her if she ought to have it, and this House ought to give it; and if she is not entitled to it, then she ought not to have it. But knowing these people as I do; knowing that they are entitled to full credit; that they are people who can be depended upon, who would not ask what they are not entitled justly to receive, I trust the House will consider it favorably, and give an opportunity at all events for a hearing in open House.

I am ready to answer any questions that may be necessary to explain any point in the case which may not be clearly understood.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has the gentleman from New York any evidence on hand that was not before the committee?

Mr. PRESCOTT. I have no additional evidence to what was before the Commissioner or before the committee, except in regard to this matter of the tornado that I have looked up myself and the statements I have here in regard to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would like to inquire if the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] appeared before the committee and made as good a speech there as he has made here?

Mr. PRESCOTT. I did not. I had no knowledge when the bill was to be considered; or I think there never would have been an adverse report in this case.

Mr. ALDRICH. It does credit to the gentleman from New York to plead so eloquently for his friend. But I must say it is asking a good deal of us to vote for a bill that has been twice reported by committees adversely.

Mr. PRESCOTT. The gentleman is mistaken. It has not been reported twice adversely.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood that statement to be embraced in the report of the committee of the Senate, which the gentleman caused to be read.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Oh, no. The bill passed the Senate and comes here.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that. But in that report from the Senate, as I understood it, the Senate committee stated they reported the bill favorably, although there had been a previous adverse report.

Mr. PRESCOTT. By the Commissioner.

Mr. ALDRICH. I supposed it had been an adverse report by a committee. There is one adverse report on the case at any rate.

Mr. McMILLIN. It should be remembered that the Commissioner in making his report had all the appliances of taking evidence, which we have not.

Mr. PRESCOTT. The statement in the report which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] misunderstood is that the application was rejected October 25, 1879, by the Commissioner. And I would suggest that all of these cases on the Calendar that have been considered by the Commissioner at all have been rejected by him, or they would not be here. Some of them of course are cases that do not go before the Commissioner.

Mr. McMILLIN. In a number of them new facts are presented. Others belong to a class for which the general law does not provide, and the Commissioner states as to such a case it is a meritorious one, presenting a hardship which the general law does not provide for.

Mr. PRESCOTT. In all cases, however, where there is presented to the committee additional evidence, they refer that back to the Commissioner for consideration.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir; not in all.

Mr. PRESCOTT. That has been done in cases I have had to do with, and I supposed it was the universal rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. We have occasionally this state of things presented, which ought to put us on our guard both in this House and in committee. We have had bills introduced in this House which have been referred to the committee, and after they have hung there for one or two months the committee is notified to take no action because the Commissioner of Pensions has granted the pension. If Congress admits a general appeal from the Pension Department we will have no end of business to be done. And I would suggest also if adverse reports of the committee are to go upon the Calendar and be acted on favorably in the House when only two or three dozen members are present, an adverse report by the committee will amount to very little.

Mr. DAWES. If I correctly recollect this case as it was presented before the committee, there seems to be one new fact which has been brought here by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRESCOTT.] That is in regard to the injury to the soldier. I think the fact of his having asthma was before the committee, and there was a doubt in the minds of the committee whether that disease of asthma was contracted in the line of his duty.

Mr. McMILLIN. If my friend from Ohio [Mr. DAWES] will recall the remarks of the gentleman from New York he will remember that the new evidence presented is merely confirmatory evidence of the raging of the tornado. That is about all there is that is new. The gentleman produced confirmatory evidence from the Star, a paper published here, of there having been a tornado.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps I misunderstood the gentleman from New York, but I thought he stated it was in evidence that the soldier was injured.

Mr. PRESCOTT. That is in evidence, established as a fact and not contradicted.

Mr. McMILLIN. That was not new evidence. That was before the commissioner.

Mr. DAWES. It seemed to me from the presentation of the case by the gentleman from New York that the soldier was injured by this tornado, and that that injury, received it appears in the line of his duty, caused the so-called asthmatic trouble from which he suffered until his taking off by the so-called acute pneumonia.

Now, that presents the case to me as it did not strike me when I heard it presented in the committee. But it only suggests to my mind this point: whether one disability can take a man to the edge of the grave and another push him in which has an entirely different origin; and a second question for us to consider is how far this injury received by the soldier under those circumstances was the cause of the soldier's death.

Mr. MATSON rose.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Will the gentleman from Indiana before he proceeds allow me to state that in addition to what I have examined in regard to this tornado I have also the letter to which I have referred, which I do not understand was before the Commissioner, in which the soldier states his injuries?

Mr. MATSON. I remember this case and its disposition in the committee very well. I think it was disposed of rather summarily there and without a very full statement of the facts in the case. I think it was disposed of on a statement that there seemed to be no connection between the injury and the disease of which the soldier died.

My observation has been in many of these pension cases that it would be very difficult for the ordinary mind to discover the connection between the disease of which the soldier died and the injury or disease that he contracted in the service. However, upon our committee we have a very competent physician and ex-army surgeon, whose services have been frequently brought to bear upon cases of this kind. But my recollection is that he was not present at the time this case was considered, and, as I have already stated, it was considered and disposed of in rather a summary manner.

Several cases of the kind I have alluded to have been before our committee, where it was difficult to discover the pathological connection between the disease of which the soldier died and the injury he received while in the service. But in this case it seems to me we might discover very easily the connection. If the soldier was injured about the chest, as the evidence shows he was, a disease of the lungs might be presumed to have resulted from that kind of injury; and the ordinary mind can see that a disease of that kind might have so resulted.

The claim in this case was rejected by the Pension Office, after passing the scrutiny of the medical examiner of that office, upon the ground that there was no connection between the death to the disease contracted. I have known cases to be rejected in that office which I thought were wrongfully rejected on that ground. And I have known this present Congress, in at least two instances, to grant pensions because of the fact that the claims were wrongfully rejected by the Pension Office.

I believe that, upon the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] as to the character of this soldier and as to the character of his family, and upon all the facts taken in connection with this case, this pension ought to be allowed. I did not vote to make an adverse report to the House, and therefore I feel perfectly free to vote here to lay the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House, and I will do so.

Mr. PRESCOTT. It may be that I should call attention to the additional fact that the hail-storm, as described by the Star, which resulted in the blowing down of the barracks, left this soldier, with other soldiers, as appears by his letter, &c., out in the storm. They became drenched with the rain, and the result of that was that this soldier took a severe cold, which hung upon him until the time of his discharge.

I might refer the Committee of the Whole to the action of the Pension Committee and the action of the House in the case of Amanda J. McFadden. In that case the soldier was injured by a gun-shot wound in the ankle, yet he died of cancer in the stomach. The committee reported in favor of giving a pension in that case, claiming that the healing up of the wound in the ankle caused dyspepsia, and that caused cancer in the stomach. Certainly the connection between the cause of death and the disease contracted in this case is very much closer than in that one.

Mr. MANNING. And that death occurred some twenty years after the wound.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Yes, the death from cancer occurred more than twenty years after.

Mr. McMILLIN. Can you see the connection in the cancer case.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I can in this case.

Mr. MANNING. I happen to know all about the case referred to, and the doctor was able to show the connection, the attending physician.

Mr. McMILLIN. And in this case the attending physician was not able to show it; that is the difference.

Mr. MANNING. I am speaking in answer to your inquiry, and not in answer to something that you did not inquire about.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will not object to laying this bill aside to be reported favorably to the House, provided it is understood that there shall be no vote upon it in the House without a quorum.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I do not ask that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw my objection with that understanding.

The bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELLEN GILLESPIE.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4082) granting a pension to Ellen Gillespie.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen Gillespie, widow of John W. Gillespie, late a private in Company F, Twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay her a pension for herself and her six children under sixteen years of age, from the date of the death of her husband, the 9th of July, A. D. 1878, at the rate of pensions for widows of deceased privates in the late war of the rebellion; her said husband, John W. Gillespie, having died from the effect of wounds received while in the military service of the United States and in line of duty during the late war of the rebellion.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 4082, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

This bill was before the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-sixth Congress, to whom the subject was referred and favorably considered, and passed the House of Representatives, but was not acted on in the Senate for want of time. We append and adopt as our own the report of the committee of the Forty-sixth Congress upon the subject:

"John W. Gillespie enlisted January 21, 1862, in Company F, Twenty-eighth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was wounded at the battle of Antietam on the 17th of September, 1862, and was discharged by reason of said wound February 6, 1863. He was pensioned from the 10th of November, 1865, at $3 per month, and his pension was increased to $5 per month from May 6, 1874. He died at his home in Cambria County, Pennsylvania, on the 9th of July, 1878, from the effects of wounds received in service. At the time of his death he left a widow, Ellen Gillespie, and six children. The widow filed her application for pension on the 15th of October, 1878, and on the 5th of February, 1879, it was rejected because her husband's death 'was not a result of his military service.'

"The committee have carefully examined the evidence on file in this case, and they are of the opinion that the evidence shows clearly that the wound received, and for which John W. Gillespie in his life-time was pensioned, was the cause of his death.

Dr. R. Deveraux, a practicing physician of good standing, and who was the family physician of John W. Gillespie for about eleven years preceding his death, on the 28th day of October, 1878, testifies as follows:

"'His (Gillespie's) wound is a gun-wound, passing through the right arm about the lower third of the humerus, then entering the thorax about three inches below the nipple, a little to the outer side, passing downward through a portion of the lower lobe of the right lung, through the diaphragm, then through or coming in contact with the upper and posterior part of the liver in that region, the labus major, emerging close or within about one inch to the same or right side of the spinal column, about the region of the right kidney, a little above, the course of the ball being downward from the point of entrance to the place of exit; quite an indentation at the place of the cicatrix.

"'For several years his symptoms were pain under the ribs of the right side, deep seated, as under and on the liver, described as severe darting or shooting pains, no tenderness upon pressure, not fainting as in abscess; the pains increased in severity each year in paroxysms, sometimes intervening one, two, or three months. The attacks became more frequent, the pain more intolerable, about one year before his death. Secretions, digestion, and action of heart continued normal; a nervous, anxious appearance, resulting from continued severity of pain, differed him only from his ordinary appearance in health. Dissolution occurred suddenly in my presence; appeared as usual, suffering much pain in region described; no acceleration of pulse or respiration; lying down, and upon assuming a sitting posture, placed both hands immediately over the location of the pain in right side; pressed firmly; at once expired, respiration and circulation immediately ceasing. No post-mortem being made, from the obscurity of the case and its symptoms, I am led to believe that the wound, or injury resulting from the wound, was, if not the immediate, the remote cause of his death. I have no interest directly or indirectly in the prosecution of this claim.

"'I have been his physician for nearly eleven years, and believe he had no other disease. Gave him no treatment but for pains described, and believe he had no other disease and was treated for none other during the above length of time.'

"Mrs. Gillespie was left a widow in destitute circumstances, and has six children. Her neighbors speak of her as being a very industrious and worthy lady, and that she should be pensioned."

The committee recommend the passage of the bill, believing that this is a meritorious case, with this amendment: Striking out all after the word "volunteers" in line 8 of said bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions was to strike out all of the bill after the words, "Twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN ADAMS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2626) granting a pension to John Adams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Adams, who enlisted in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on Commodore Ellet's ram-fleet.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions submit the following report:

The petitioner, John Adams, enlisted on Commodore Ellet's ram-fleet at Pittsburgh, on the 14th or 15th of May, 1862, and was assigned to duty on board the "Lioness." At the battle of Memphis, Tennessee, June 7, 1862, he received a bullet wound over the left eye and in the left arm; and while patroling the river from the mouth of the Yazoo River toward Memphis, August 15, 1862, he was shot from the shore by guerrillas, the ball penetrating above the right haunch, and the wounded man falling down a hatch, breaking right elbow.

Dr. W. L. Morrow, of Freeport, Pennsylvania, in his sworn statement, June 14, 1880, says the petitioner is entirely unable to perform any labor, and cannot walk or get up from his chair without assistance on account of the wound in the haunch bone.

The ground on which the application was rejected by the Pension Office is, that the petitioner was not in the military or naval service of the United States, but in the Quartermaster's Department. Your committee is, nevertheless, of the opinion that he received his disability in the line of duty and that the claim is a meritorious one, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALFRED G. FIFIELD.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1020) granting an increase of pension to Alfred G. Fifield.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alfred G. Fifield, late a private in Company C, Twelfth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $24 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1020) granting an increase of pension to Alfred G. Fifield, having had the same under consideration beg leave to submit the following report:

The claimant was a private in Company C, Twelfth New Hampshire Volunteers; enlisted August 17, 1862; discharged November 17, 1863, on surgeon's certificate of disability, "on account of gunshot wound at Chancellorsville, Virginia, which caused a resection of the humerus, (right arm.)" The shot which wounded Fifield hit his right arm near the shoulder and shattered the bone so that the head and four or five inches of the humerus had to be removed.

[Extract from the letter of Commissioner of Pensions, dated ——— —, 18—, transmitting papers to the committee.]

"The claim was originally allowed at $5.33 per month from date of soldier's discharge, November 17, 1863. His pension was increased to $8 per month from September 4, 1865; to $15 from June 6, 1866; and to $18 from June 4, 1872. His subsequent applications for increase have been rejected, because his disability is not such as would entitle him to the next highest rate provided by the pension laws—$24 per month. It is conceded that the injury to the arm is equivalent to actual loss of the same above the elbow, but the rate of $24 per month, which the law provides for such loss, is not provided for a disability equivalent thereto, and unless a person is otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for the performance of any manual labor, no higher rate than $18 per month can be allowed."

From the medical evidence in the case we extract the following:

"Dr. David B. Nelson, examining surgeon, February 1, 1864, certifies—

"'The arm is helpless and useless.'

"Dr. Ira A. Chase, at biennial examination, September 4, 1865, certifies—

"'The arm is entirely useless; should be increased to full pension.'

"The board of examining surgeons at Concord, New Hampshire, September 6, 1875, certify—

"'Disability is permanent, at total third grade.'

"Dr. D. B. Nelson, examining surgeon at Laconia, February 7, 1876, certifies—

"'This disability is fully tantamount to the loss of the arm above the elbow. Disability, second grade—$24 per month.'

"Dr. Chase, again, August, 7, 1876, certifies—

"'The right arm is entirely useless, the head and four inches of the right humerus is gone, and the arm hangs dangling by his side; he could not dress or undress himself if both were like the injured arm, and amounts to total loss of right arm.'

"Again, the same physician says—

"'The arm is in the way of laboring; in my opinion the pension should be increased to full pension.'

"G. P. Conn, M. D., for the board of examining surgeons, Concord, New Hampshire, February 1, 1877, in reply to a letter of instructions from the medical referee of the Pension Office, says:

"'He was rated at $24 per month. The board would further state that claimant is so far debilitated that the other arm is incapacitated for other than the very lightest of duty, he being able only to canvass for the sale of a book for a long time.'

"Warren W. Sleeper, M. D., examining surgeon, January 9, 1878, certifies:

"'Total: second grade, or $24 per month.'

"The board of examining surgeons, at Concord, New Hampshire, January 3, 1879, certify:

"'He cannot perform any manual labor, nor is this rating in any way considered an equivalent to the loss of an arm above the elbow. Disability total; second grade, or $24 per month.'"

The affidavits of neighbors and friends of the petitioner are quite as strong as the medical evidence. They testify to his inability to perform manual labor, and to his correct habits of life.

Your committee are of the opinion that from the weight of medical evidence alone the petitioner is entitled to the relief prayed for. We therefore report favorably upon the case, and recommend the passage of the bill granting an increase of pension to Alfred G. Fifield from $18 to $24 per month.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ABAGAIL S. TILTON.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 108) granting an increase of pension to Abagail S. Tilton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Abagail S. Tilton, at the rate of $16 per month, to date from the passage of this act: Provided, That all payments heretofore made shall first be deducted.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill S. No. 108, submit the following report:

The facts touching the case of Mrs. Tilton are correctly stated in House Report No. 692, Forty-sixth Congress, as follows:

"It is in evidence that the husband of the petitioner, Benjamin Stevens, was a soldier of the Revolutionary war, and was mustered into service on the 18th day of July, 1777, serving as a private in Captain Samuel McConnell's company, of Colonel Thomas Stickney's regiment, of the brigade commanded by General Stark, and was honorably discharged on the 18th day of September, 1777.

"It is also in evidence that at the date of the petitioner's marriage with the said Benjamin Stevens she was the widow of David Tilton, and was married to said Stevens on the 31st day of January, 1831, and that they lived together until his death, which occurred on the 25th day of August, 1832; that she subsequently married Adoniram Paige, who died in 1848; that by special act of the New Hampshire Legislature approved January 4, 1849, she was permitted to take the name of Abagail S. Tilton, and in which name she now petitions Congress for relief.

"It is in evidence, by letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, that by the act of Congress approved February 3, 1853, she was entitled to have her name placed upon the pension-rolls at any time prior to June 22, 1874, at which date the aforesaid law was repealed.

"It is also shown that it was through no fault of the petitioner that she did not avail herself of the provisions thereof before its repeal. Living in a secluded country place, and knowing but little of the proper manner of making application for pension, she caused a petition to be drawn up setting forth in full the facts in her case, which was sent to the member of Congress from her district and by him was deposited in the petition-box of the House June 8, 1868, as is shown by the Journal. The petitioner was soon afterward informed by one she had reason to rely upon that she was not entitled to a pension, and therefore slept on her rights until informed of her error long after the repeal of the act of February 3, 1853.

"It is also in evidence that since the death of her third husband, Adoniram Paige, she has lived with and been supported by Nathaniel D. Tilton, the son of her first husband, until about three years since, when he died, by which event she is now left childless and destitute; that she is now nearly ninety years of age and in receipt of no means whatever to furnish food or clothing or medical attendance and nursing in her last years of life. In consideration of which, and in accordance with the spirit of the act approved March 11, 1878, granting pensions to widows of Revolutionary soldiers, the committee submit herewith a bill granting her a pension at the rate of $16 per month, believing that will meet her needs more fully than the provisions of the bill H. R. No. 3298, which provides for payment at the rate of $8 per month from 1854 to date of special act granting her a pension, March 3, 1879.

"Your committee therefore report back the bill (H. R. No. 3298) with a substitute therefor, and recommend the adoption and passage thereof."

A similar bill for her relief passed the Senate and was favorably reported to the House in the Forty-sixth Congress, but failed to be considered for want of time. This aged lady is now in a helpless condition and dependent upon charity for support beyond the $8 per month she is now receiving pursuant to the special act for her benefit passed March 3, 1879.

The unfortunate delays which deprived her of a pension during so many years that she was clearly entitled to it under the law have also attended her efforts to get the relief which Congress has always been willing to bestow, and the bill introduced in the Senate this session provided that her increase from $8 to $16 per month should commence March 3, 1879, but it was amended before its passage by striking out the allowance of arrears, so that the increase should take effect only upon the passage of the act.

Your committee find by an examination of the Senate bill that the proviso—evidently referring to the arrears, (which were stricken out on recommendation of the Senate Pension Committee,) in the following words: "Provided, That all payments heretofore made shall be first deducted"—ought to be struck out also. Undoubtedly said proviso was retained through inadvertence in the Senate, and we recommend the passage of the bill after amending the same by striking out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. RAY. I desire to call attention to the fact that this bill is reported with an amendment. The Senate passed a bill proposing to pay this woman a pension of $16 per month, "provided that all payments heretofore made shall be first deducted." The intention of the Senate was evidently to strike out the allowance of all arrearages which the original bill provided for, and at the same time this proviso should have been struck out with the clause allowing arrears, but probably the proviso was retained through inadvertence. The House Committee on Invalid Pensions, discovering this error, reported an amendment to strike out the proviso. This old lady, now upward of eighty years of age, has been drawing a pension at the rate of $8 per month. The proposition now is to give her $16 per month, instead of $8; but if all she has received is to be deducted, pursuant to the proviso, before the increased rate of pension shall operate, this bill will be of no benefit to her, unless she should live a good while.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the committee to strike out the words "provided that all payments heretofore made shall be first deducted," it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY C. J. BUDLONG.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1164) for the relief of Mary C. J. Budlong.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to determine, and that thereupon the same be paid, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mary C. J. Budlong, the arrears of pension or loss to her by reason of the delay of the Pension Department to act upon her application for a pension, from the date of filing thereof until the actual granting of same, she being the widow of John Budlong, who was a private of Captain Catlin's Company, New York State Militia, in the war of 1812, and in which he was wounded and disabled.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1164) for the relief of Mary C. J. Budlong, would respectfully report:

That Mary C. J. Budlong is the widow of John Budlong, who was a private in Captain Catlin's Company of New York Militia in the war of 1812 and 1814; that there is no proof of his term of service, and it is only generally shown to have been at least fourteen days. John Budlong died April 27, 1854. In 1864 his widow, Mary C. J. Budlong, applied for a pension. As the law then stood this could only be granted on proof that he died by reason of service. This was sought to be done by the claim that he was troubled with chronic diarrhea, and had a hernia, caused by gun-shot wound. No connection of these with the service in the war was shown, except statements of deceased, and, the Commissioner of Pensions not being satisfied with the proofs, the claim was rejected. John Budlong does not appear upon the company rolls of Captain Catlin's Company as a member, and the only proof of service is that of two claimed comrades—Caleb Green and John Green—both of whom appear by the records as deserters after only thirteen days' service. Upon this proof the claimant obtained a land warrant.

March 9, 1878, an act was passed, entitled "An act amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and their widows, and for other purposes."

Prior to the passage of this act a bill had been introduced in the Forty-fifth Congress for a pension to this claimant, Mary C. J. Budlong, asking arrears from the date of the death of her husband. After the passage of the act of March 9, 1878, the Senate committee reported adversely upon such bill, referring her to her rights under such act. She thereupon applied under that act, which provided—

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, without regard to color, including militia and volunteers of the military and naval service of the United States, who served for fourteen days in the war with Great Britain of 1812, or who were in any engagement, and were honorably discharged, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted and drafted men.

"When any person has been granted a land warrant under any act of Congress for and on account of service in the war of 1812 such grant shall be prima facie evidence of his service and honorable discharge, so as to entitle him, if living, or his widow, if he be dead, to a pension under this act."

As the proof of service upon which the land warrant was issued showed the deserters, making some to have been themselves in the service but thirteen days, although they swore John Budlong was in the service fourteen days, the Commissioner rejected the claim for pension under the act of 1878 on the 3d September, 1879, on the ground as therein stated:

"The testimony of Caleb Green and John Green in bounty-land claim cannot be accepted, as both men only served from 7th to 20th October, when they deserted; consequently only served thirteen days, not a pensionable service. Having deserted on the 20th of October, they cannot testify as to service on that day."

This decision was afterward reopened, and upon another examination it was held that both days might be taken, making the fourteen days required by the act of 1878, and on the 27th February, 1880, a pension was granted claimant of $8 per month with arrears, and commencing from March 9, 1878, the date of the said act under which it was allowed.

Claimant now asks by her petition to have arrears from the date of the discharge of her husband, in 1812 or 1814, to the date of the commencement of her present pension—March 9, 1878. This is a much larger demand of arrears than was asked of the Forty-fifth Congress, and one that has never been granted in any known case. The claimant has received pension from the earliest point of time she could by any construction of law claim same, and as long as all other like cases.

Your committee see no reason for making this an exceptional case, establishing a bad precedent, and they therefore report adversely upon said bill, and ask that the same do not pass.

Mr. BROWNE. From information now before me I move that this bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES F. PARIS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4268) granting a pension to Charles F. Paris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles F. Paris, late of Company F, One hundred and twenty-third Indiana Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 4268, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

Charles F. Paris was a soldier in the One hundred and twenty-third Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, and, as such, served out his time. His officers and comrades in their testimony speak of him as an excellent soldier, always at the front, and making for himself an excellent record as a patriotic volunteer. His regiment was in the field during the whole time of its service, and was engaged in the principal battles of the Western campaigns.

He was, soon after his discharge, stricken with some disease of the lungs, which the examining surgeon of the Pension Department states as his belief was attributable to his Army service. That disease has progressed until he is now, and has been for several years, incapable of performing manual labor. He applied for a pension on the 20th day of January, 1876, and his application has been recently rejected, upon the ground that there is no specific proof of the incurrence of the disease in the military service of the United States. The proof of any affirmative fact is wanting; but upon the other hand the proof of his entire soundness at enlistment, his exposure and service in the Army, and his prostration soon after leaving the service, the absence of any hereditary or other specific cause for his debility, compel the conclusion that it must have resulted from the service. This committee is disposed to give him the benefit of any doubts in the case, in view particularly of his excellent character as a soldier and a citizen, as abundantly testified to, and they recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELECTA L. BALDWIN.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2104) granting a pension to Mrs. Electa L. Baldwin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Electa L. Baldwin, widow of Charles Baldwin, late a private in Company B, Seventh Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, at the rate of $8 per month, to date from the time of the discharge from the service in the late war of the rebellion of the said Charles Baldwin, on account of injuries received while in the line of duty in the Army of the United Stotes.

Mr. BROWNE. Is there no amendment reported with this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands there is not.

Mr. BROWNE. Then I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2104) granting a pension to Electa L. Baldwin, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

From the papers before this committee it appears that Electa L. Baldwin is the legal widow of Charles Baldwin, who was a private in Company B, Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry. Baldwin, as shown by the record of the War Department, enlisted September 21, 1861, performed active military duty until July 13, 1862, when taken prisoner in action at Murfreesborough, Tennessee. He reported at Camp Parole, Maryland, in September, 1862, was forwarded to Cincinnati, Ohio, and on the 21st of November, 1862, admitted to general hospital at Covington, Kentucky, with distortion of spine, from which hospital he was discharged the service December 15, 1862, on surgeon's certificate of disability, setting forth as disabling cause angular curvature of the dorsal spine, which disease, in the opinion of the surgeon, existed before enlistment in a latent condition. The soldier died September 24, 1865, according to the certificate of the attending physician, of pelvic abscess and tumor on back.

The widow's claim for pension has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the soldier died of disease which originated prior to entering the service. This action seems to have been based simply upon the opinion expressed by the surgeon in the certificate of disability, to the effect that the curvature of the spine existed in a latent condition before enlistment.

There is, in the opinion of this committee, ample proof of the soldier's soundness at time of his enlistment. Neighbors and fellow-soldiers testify that Baldwin was a very stout, healthy man before his enlistment, and particularly free from any disease of the spine. The cause of the disease is not shown as clearly as it probably could be shown by the claimant had the Pension Office permitted her to overcome the adverse record. She alleges that it was due to a fall from his horse, and a sergeant of the company testifies that the soldier, a few weeks prior to his discharge, was taken with severe pains in back, which resulted in the disability for which he was discharged and finally caused his death. It also appears in evidence that shortly after discharge soldier's condition became worse. A tumor weighing nearly a pound was cut from the spine about five months after his return from the Army. He was unable to perform any labor, and suffered greatly until relieved by death on September 24, 1865.

It is evident from the opinion of the medical referee of the Pension Office, on file with the papers, that could it be clearly shown that the soldier was sound at enlistment, the origin of the fatal disease in service would have to be conceded.

The sworn statements of persons having personal knowledge of the soldier's condition before enlistment, whose credibility is properly established, are, in the opinion of this committee, entitled to more consideration than the statement of a surgeon of a general hospital, who from the very nature of the circumstances could not have any knowledge of the soldier prior to his admission to the hospital, and therefore is inclined to give to the claimant the benefits of doubt, which necessarily must surround the origin of a disease of an obscure character, by reporting favorably on the bill and asking that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I prepared the report in this case, and it is evidently an oversight that no amendment was reported with the bill. It ought to be amended so as to provide that this woman shall be placed on the pension-roll subject to the general provisions of the pension law.

Mr. BROWNE. So that the pension shall begin from and after the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that amendment will be made.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES E. GOTT.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 627) to increase the pension of James E. Gott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of James E. Gott, late a member of Company A, Fourteenth Regiment Maine Volunteers, to $24 per month.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 627) to increase the pension of James E. Gott, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Gott was a private in Company A, Fourteenth Maine Volunteers, and served from December 7, 1861, to March 4, 1863, when discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability, setting forth that the soldier was suffering from debility caused by long-continued illness and perforation of the cheek, from gangrene and ulceration of the mouth. He was allowed a pension at $8 per month, which rate was increased to $12 from July 16, 1873, and to $18 from December 28, 1876. A further application for increase, filed July 20, 1880, was rejected by the Pension Office upon the statement made by the postmaster of the town in which the pensioner resides, that the pensioner was able to work about one-third of the time.

The medical evidence in the case shows the following disability: Cicatrix extending from left angle of mouth two and one-half inches obliquely upward; left cheek adherent to superior and inferior maxillary bones; anchylosis of lower jaw; very slight lateral motion; vertical motion about one-sixtieth of one inch; can take only liquid food, the use of solid food impossible. He suffers for want of proper nourishment, and is unable to perform any manual labor.

As the Pension Office concedes the disability to be chargeable to scurvy contracted in the service, but accepts the statement of a non-professional instead of the certificates of the examining surgeons as to the pensioner's ability to perform manual labor, the judgment of this committee is that little, if any, manual labor can be performed by a person compelled to subsist on liquid food only; they therefore report favorably on the bill and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZA J. YARNALL.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4535) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Yarnall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Eliza J. Yarnall, widow of the late Captain Mordecai Yarnall, upon the pension-roll, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month instead of the pension now paid to her under the law, the said increased pension to commence from the date of the passage of this act.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4535) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Yarnall, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner is the widow of Mordecai Yarnall, who was appointed professor of mathematics in the Navy in 1839, and served in that capacity until his retirement April 16, 1878. He died at Gergetown, District of Columbia, February 27, 1879. During the last sixteen years of his service he was stationed at the Naval Observatory in Washington. He was a man of very fine scientific attainment. It is said of him:

"Professor Yarnall was a hard-working, patient, faithful laborer in that Observatory for about thirty-five years, working with little vacation, with great constancy, (continuing to labor even after his age had retired him,) spending large portions of his nights in making observations and of his days in computing, arranging, &c., with that laborious patience and endurance which nothing but a deep love for his work and profession could inspire. The fruit of his star-gazing appears in his catalogue of stars, two editions of which have been published by the Government. The second edition, revised, enlarged, and prepared for publication after he was placed on the retired list, was the last work of his life, and the first printed copy reached him a few hours after his death. * * * No more faithful labor than his was ever done in that Observatory or elsewhere."

Professor Yarnall's widow receives the full pension provided by law, $20 per month. She is said to be in "narrow circumstances" and in very bad health.

This case is perhaps as deserving a one of its class as could be found. But, nevertheless, this committee does not see in the case anything not liable to result to the family of any officer in like service. Nothing arises in the case to show that extraordinary hardships or sufferings from war service in any way caused or hastened Professor Yarnall's death. For many years this officer had before him the law as to the rate of pension, (since 1862.) His compensation for service was $3,500 per annum. The Government cannot be held to be in fault for the present narrow circumstances of the widow, and to establish a precedent in that direction would, in the judgment of this committee, be wrong.

Your committee therefore reports adversely on the bill, and asks to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. BROWNE. As the report in this case is adverse, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

EDWARD FARR.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1154) granting a pension to Edward Farr.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward Farr, late a private in Company E, One hundred and seventeenth Regiment New York State Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill No. 1154, having had the same under consideration, would respectfully report:

The claimant, Edward Farr, enlisted August 6, 1862, in Company E, One hundred and seventeenth New York Volunteers. He was discharged March 12, 1863.

The claimant's proofs show, by affidavit of his family physician, that his physical condition for several years prior to enlistment had been always good, requiring no treatment; that he was a strong, able-bodied man, working at all kinds of farm labor, and having no heart disease. These facts are also testified to by several of his neighbors.

The affidavit of the examining surgeon of the regiment, who examined claimant for muster into the service, shows he was then in "sound health and free from any disease or affection of the heart."

The affidavit of the assistant surgeon of the One hundred and seventeenth Regiment is that after claimant had been in the service some five or six months claimant, "from rapid marches in the performance of his duty as a soldier, and exposure to the wet and cold at time of such marches, and immediately following the same, was taken severely ill, and with such illness was confined several months in tent at Camp Morris, Maryland, and until discharged from service, during which time affiant attended upon the said Farr medically as surgeon aforesaid, and gave him treatment; that the said illness of the said Farr resulted in an affection of his heart, on account of which he, the said Farr, was discharged from the service." The proofs show, and it is conceded, that claimant has continued, since his discharge, affected with this heart disease, and that it has destroyed his power to labor. So appears by the certificate of the examining surgeon of the Pension Office.

The assistant surgeon testifying to the facts of the contraction of this disease is now one of the examining surgeons of the Pension Department, and a man entitled to full credit.

The certificate to the discharge, and upon which this man was discharged, is made by another assistant surgeon, who is not shown to have had any personal knowledge of claimant prior to enlistment, but who states "he finds him incapable of performing the duties of a soldier, because of disease of the heart, which existed to some extent prior to his enlistment, but which permanently disqualifies him for the service."

Because of the words "which existed to some extent prior to his enlistment," the Pension Office rejected the claim.

So far as can be discovered in the whole case, these words were inserted in this certificate solely as an opinion by a surgeon not personally acquainted with claimant, but they are construed to outweigh the sworn testimony of the surgeon and assistant surgeon of the regiment, the testimony of claimant's family physician, and neighbors.

This pension was applied for March 29, 1871.

We then have the testimony of claimant's family physician and neighbors that this disease of the heart did not exist before enlistment; the testimony of his regimental surgeon that it did not exist when he was mustered into the regiment; the testimony of his assistant regimental surgeon as to the hardship of service producing illness resulting "in an affection of the heart," "on account of which he was discharged;" that the same has continued and still exists.

There is no evidence whatever to the contrary, except this statement in the certificate before stated.

This case was fully considered in the Forty-sixth Congress and reported favorably, and your committee are of the opinion that claimant is justly and legally entitled to a pension, and report back said bill and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

HUGO EICHHOLTZ.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5820) granting a pension to Hugo Eichholtz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws, the name of Hugo Eichholtz, late a sergeant of Company L, Fifteenth New York Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act, which shall be in lieu of that which he now receives.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5820) granting a pension to Hugo Eichholtz, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

The Committee on Pensions of the United States Senate has recently given the case a very careful examination, and in its very able report embodied a full history of the several actions on the part of the Pension Office in the original allowance of the claimant's pension, subsequent increases, and final reduction to $24 per month.

Concurring in the conclusions reached by said committee, this committee adopts, as its own, the report of the Senate Pension Committee (No. 371) in words as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, having had under consideration the bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Hugo Eichholtz, which provides for his restoration to $72 per month, in lieu of $24, to which he had been reduced and now receives, report:

"That the soldier was originally pensioned at $8 per month for gunshot wounds of right thigh and left foot, and his pension was repeatedly increased, until in December, 1874, he was, under the provisions of act of June 18, 1874, granted a pension of $50 per month. (See admitted brief.)

"His pension was further increased to $72 under the provisions of act of June 16, 1880, and on the same certificate which granted said increase was reduced to $24 per month.

"He appealed from the action of the Pension Office, claiming that the reduction of his pension was made in violation of the requirements of the act of 1880, and contrary to the evidence as to the degree of disability. The decision of the Commissioner was affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, on the ground that the facts now show that the appellant should never under the law have been granted $50 per month; for either he was not at the date of such allowance totally helpless, or if he was such helplessness was not permanent. (See letter of Hon. S. J. Kirkwood.)

"It is found from an examination of this case that the certificate of disability upon which the soldier was discharged shows that in consequence of gunshot wounds of the right thigh and left foot he was totally disabled for military service and for civil occupation wholly. In 1866 he was examined by an examining surgeon of the Pension Office, who, after minutely describing the nature of his injuries, states that—

"'This man requires constant attendance, and presents a pitiable spectacle in the extreme; his disabilities are permanent, and it is not improbable that his injuries will cause his early death.'

"He was again examined in 1871, the surgeon finding that—

"'A missile entered inner and upper part of right thigh, shattering femur, and passing out externally and posteriorly three inches below trochanter major. A second ball entered anterior surface of same thigh four inches below the first wound. The entire limb is atrophied, distorted, and shortened fully five inches. A ball passed through the left foot, entering on soler surface, and shattered second and third metatarsal bones; the foot is contracted, and he can only rest on its inner edge. There are two cicatrices on right shoulder, apparently from abscesses, and limb cannot be fully extended. He requires the services of an attendant constantly.'

"In 1873 another examining surgeon describes the foregoing injuries, and finds that the motions of the shoulder joint are impaired; that he cannot stand alone, and that he requires the regular aid and attendance of another person.

"Subsequent examinations in 1874, 1875, and 1877 show that the same degree of disability then existed, and the reports agree that the soldier's injuries were permanent and total, and that he required the regular aid and attendance of another person.

"This evidence appears to have been regarded as satisfactory until after the soldier made his application for pension at $72 per month. He was then notified that evidence was required showing his present physical condition, and that he required and received the attendance of another person.

"In compliance with these requirements he filed the affidavit of his family physician, who swears that he has attended the claimant professionally for the past six years; that in his opinion the soldier's lower limbs are more of an incumbrance and less assistance than artificial ones would be; that he has always, since affiant has been his physician, required constant bodily attendance, not only from and to his house, but at home, and expresses the opinion that should he dispense with such attendance, even temporarily, he does so at great peril.

"He also files the testimony of thirteen witnesses, who swear positively from their personal, and in some cases daily, observations, that claimant is now and has been for years past a helpless cripple, unable to rise from his bed, dress or undress himself, sit down or rise up without help, and constantly requiring and receiving the regular aid and attendance of another person.

"In January, 1881, the board of surgeons of this city examined Eichholtz under minute and special instructions from the Pension Office, and reported his condition in language almost identical with that employed in preceding certificates, except that in their opinion he did not require regular aid and attendance of another person, and that he is not entitled to more than $24 under the law, and upon this report his pension was reduced from $72 to $24 per month.

"The evidence is conflicting, but your committee think the equities are largely in favor of the claimant, and recommend that the claimant should have an increase of pension to $50 per month; and, so amended, your committee recommend that the bill do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

EARL S. RATHBUN.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 891) granting a pension to Earl S. Rathbun.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Earl S. Rathbun, said pension to be at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the date of the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 891) granting a pension to Earl S. Rathbun, have carefully examined the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions of this Congress made in this case, and numbered 146, and, concurring in the views expressed by that committee, beg leave to adopt said report as their own, in words as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 891) granting a pension to Earl S. Rathbun, having carefully examined the same, report as follows:

"That a bill was introduced in the Senate (S. No. 1808) during the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, granting a pension of $8 a month to Earl S. Rathbun. The Committee on Pensions made the following report on the bill:

"'The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1808) granting a pension to Earl S. Rathbun, have examined the same, and report:

"'The claimant enlisted at the outbreak of the late war as a private in Company C, Eighth Missouri Volunteer Infantry. He was then a resident of Saint Louis, following the vocation of a clerk and bookkeeper, and was of robust health. He was an excellent soldier and did good service, having been promoted to orderly sergeant for meritorious conduct. He was engaged in the battle of Shiloh; and in the exposure of severe and forced marches immediately after that battle he contracted rheumatism and disease of the chest. These diseases became chronic, and he became wholly incapable of manual labor, and is now bedridden and without hope of recovery. These facts are proven by the surgeon of his regiment, his family physician in Saint Louis, and several of his comrades. The claimant was discharged from service in October, 1862, but having partially recovered he joined the Mississippi squadron for operations around Vicksburgh. There he performed duty as ship-writer, steward, &c., but was all the time delicate and suffering from debility, rheumatism, and his lungs, until he was again compelled to quit the service.

"'The Pension Office ignored his rheumatism, debility, and total and permanent incapacity for labor and allowed him on account only of diseased lungs arrears of pension at the rate of $2 per month, commencing from the date of his discharge in October, 1862, but deducting from the time the period of his service in the Mississippi squadron, and granted him a pension at the rate of $4 per month.

"'The claimant appealed from this action of the Commissioner of Pensions to Congress and claims that his pension should have been at least $8 per month.

"'The committee are of opinion that the Commissioner erred in ignoring the chronic rheumatism of the applicant and his incapacity for manual labor which gradually became total and permanent. The committee therefore recommend that the pension be increased at the rate of $8 per month, as set forth in the bill, and that said bill do pass as amended.'

"This report passed the Senate but failed on account of time to become a law.

"Your committee have adopted the above report and recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment."

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM R. PERDUE.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1468) granting a pension to William R. Perdue.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William R. Perdue, late of Company F, One hundred and fifteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, rejected by the Pension Office because alleged injuries were received on furlough, not sick or veteran.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was re-referred the bill (H. R. No. 1468) granting a pension to William R. Perdue, has examined and considered new and important evidence recently presented, from which it is evident that the former action of this committee should be reversed, and therefore reports favorably on said bill and asks that it do pass as amended.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out at the end of the bill all after the word "infantry," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

NIEL NIELSSON.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3865) for the relief of Niel Nielsson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of Niel Nielsson, of Wilmington, Delaware, late master-at-arms on board the United States revenue-cutter Seward, be placed on the pension-list at the rate of $8 per month, said pension to commence May 30, 1872.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. No. 3865, report the same back as amended.

The committee find that Niel Nielsson was duly enlisted as an ordinary seaman in the United States naval service on January 22, 1862, and served until discharged January 26, 1864, and during said service he contracted a disability, as per surgeon's report herewith, marked A, and made a part of this report, which brought him within the laws allowing him to draw a half pension.

A.

UNITED STATES NAVAL HOSPITAL,
New York, January 21, 1864.

SIR: In obedience to your order of the 19th instant, we have examined Niel Nielsson, ordinary seaman, late of the United States schooner Henry James, and report that his disability (adynamia from malarial poison) will be of uncertain duration, and one-half disables him from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor. The origin of his disability, and its connection with the performance of his duty, are thus set forth upon his hospital ticket by B. F. Gibbs, surgeon, United States Navy: "Niel Nielsson, o. sea., October 29, nat. Norway, admitted into naval hospital, Pensacola, September 21, 1863, affected with feb. intermit., which he contracted in the Mississippi River. His disease originated in line of duty."

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

THOMAS L. SMITH, Surgeon.
B. VREELAND, Surgeon.

Surgeon W. WHELAN,
Chief of Bureau Medicine and Surgery, Washington, D. C.

The committee further find that said Nielsson was borne upon the rolls of the revenue cutter Seward as seaman from October 1, 1871, to March 1, 1872, and as master-at-arms from March 1 to October 7, 1872, and that during said service he lost an arm by the premature discharge of a defective gun, while in the line of duty, as shown by papers herewith, marked B, C, and D, respectively, and made a part of this report.

B.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 25, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 23d ultimo, in which you inquire whether the records of this Department confirm the statements made in the accompanying papers of Neil Neilsson.

In reply I have respectfully to state that the records of this Department show that Neil Neilsson was borne upon the rolls of the revenue-cutter Seward, as seaman from October 1, 1871, to March 1, 1872, and as master-at-arms from March 1 to October 7, 1872, at which time he was discharged by reason of his term of service having expired. The records further show that on the 30th of May, 1872, while firing a salute under the direction of his superior officer, his wrist was shattered by the premature discharge of a gun, and that he was immediately thereafter sent to the marine hospital at Wilmington, North Carolina.

The reply has been delayed with a view to obtain further information as to the extent of the injury, but on reference to the marine-hospital records they are found to be meager, and fail to furnish more definite information.

The papers submitted by you are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. G. W. STEELE,
Chairman Sub-committee on Pensions, House of Representatives.

C.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The petition of Niel Nielsson, of the city and county of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, respectfully represents:

That your petitioner is twenty-nine years of age; that in the fall of the year 1871 he shipped for one year by regular enlistment in the revenue service of the United States of America, and was shipped at that time on board the United States revenue-cutter William H. Seward as a seaman, from which post he was promoted to that of master-at-arms; that he dutifully and actively served in that capacity until the 30th day of May, A. D. 1872, when the following described disaster to him occurred: it was "Decoration Day," and they were lying in the port of Wilmington, North Carolina, and the captain, John Carson, received orders from the United States collector of the port to fire continuous salutes of minute-guns. Your petitioner and the boatswain of the cutter were detached by the captain to fire one gun. After the second discharge the boatswain placed his thumb upon the vent and your petitioner proceeded to ram the charge, when from causes unknown the gun was prematurely discharged, carrying away your petitioner's right hand. He was therefore honorably discharged, and since that time he has found it extremely difficult to support himself, and he has never received any relief from the United States Government or any of its departments.

There being no provision made in the law by which he may obtain a pension, (he having been in the revenue service,) he therefore prays special relief from your honorable bodies. He is a citizen of the United States, and was so at the time of the above-named accident.

NIEL NIELSSON.

We, the undersigned, citizens of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, members of the Seamen's Friend Society, pastor of the old Eastburn Church, and others, do hereby certify that Neil Nielsson, whose petition for relief as indorsed herewith, is a sober, honest, and industrious citizen, is poor and deserving of the aid for which he prays; that his statement accompanying this is true, and we pray of you a favorable consideration of the said petition.

HENRY D. SHERRERD,
President Pennsylvania Seamen's Friend Society.

The subscriber respectfully recommends the petition of Niel Nielsson to the favorable consideration of Congress.

JOHN CADWALADER.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.
January 20, 1873.

Mr. BAYARD asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to bring in the following bill; which was read twice, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Niel Nielsson.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the name of Niel Nielsson, of Wilmington, Delaware, late master-at-arms on board the United States revenue-cutter Seward, be placed upon the pension list, at the rate of $8 per month, said pension to commence May 30, 1872.

After duly considering all of the foregoing facts, your committee report the bill back as amended, and recommend that it do pass.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out "1872" and insert "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PRISCILLA DECATUR TWIGGS.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5998) for the relief of Priscilla Decatur Twiggs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Priscilla Decatur Twiggs, widow of Major Levi Twiggs, late of the United States Marine Corps, who fell while leading the storming party at Chapultepec, at $50 per month, instead of $25 as it now stands, to date from and after the passage of this act.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Priscilla Decatur Twiggs, widow of the late Major Levi Twiggs, report the same back, with the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

In support of this recommendation, your committee call attention to the letter of the petitioner herewith and made a part of this report, marked A; also to the official statements B and C, made a part of this report.

A.

FEBRUARY 27, 1882.

SIR: I noticed a few days ago a resolution had been introduced by Senator GORMAN asking an increase of pension for Mrs. Dulany to $50 a month, upon what grounds I am ignorant, but imagine I have equally strong claims for asking a similar increase.

During the war with Mexico, Major Twiggs and Major Dulany were in the same brigade, Major Twiggs being the senior. My husband fell at the head of his command at the storming of Chapultepec.

At the commencement of the war with Great Britain in 1812, Major Twiggs entered the service and was appointed a lieutenant in the Marine Corps; was with my uncle, Commodore Decatur, on board the United States frigate President during the engagement with the British fleet, and whose services are thus mentioned by Commodore Decatur in his official letter to the Secretary of the Navy: "Lieutenant Twiggs, of the marines, displayed great zeal: his men were well supplied, and their fire incomparable so long as the enemy continued within musket-range." In 1836-'37 Major Twiggs was again engaged in active service in the Seminole war in Florida.

I imagine few have stronger claims upon the liberality of the Government than I have, every male relative having been in the United States service; my grandfather, Commodore Decatur, sr., having been in the French war; his two sons also held commissions in our Navy. Commodore Stephen Decatur, jr., distinguished himself by recapturing and burning the frigate Philadelphia, in the harbor of Tripoli, in which engagement his brother, James S. Decatur, was killed. Again, during the war with Great Britain, in 1812, he further distinguished himself by capturing the British frigate Macedonian.

My father, Captain James McKnight, was in the Marine Corps at the time of his death. Both my brothers were lieutenants in the Navy; the elder, Lieutenant Stephen D. McKnight, was with Commodore Porter on board the Essex, and was afterward lost at sea on board the United States sloop-of-war Wasp. As before stated, my husband fell at the storming of Chapultepec, and my only son, George D. Twiggs, was killed in an engagement one month previous, he being on his way to join his uncle, General D. E. Twiggs, as his aid.

Under these circumstances I feel I may with justice ask an increase of pension, having been in the receipt of only $25 a month since my husband's death; and being now in my eighty-first year, it must be quite apparent it can only be required for a very brief period.

Very respectfully, &c.,

PRISCILLA D. TWIGGS,
239 Maryland avenue, Baltimore, Maryland.

Hon. ROBERT M. MCLANE.

B.

HEADQUARTERS MARINE CORPS, COMMANDANT'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 20, 1882.

SIR: In obedience to the Department's request, I forward an official statement of the services of Major Levi Twiggs, in the United States Marine Corps, from date of entry to death.

It affords me great pleasure to add my testimony as an eye-witness to his gallant conduct at the moment he was killed, while bravely leading his men to the assault of the works at the base of the Castle of Chapultepec.

I was within a few feet of him at the moment, and witnessed his instantaneous death. He bore the character of a brave and zealous officer, and his services in the war of 1812 and in Florida and Mexico, in my opinion, entitle his widow not only to an increase of pension as asked, but to arrears for the years since his death. She was deprived in a month of her husband and only son, both killed while bravely fighting for the honor of the flag: and with the long record of other near relatives in the Navy and Marine Corps, which I know to be correct, she truthfully states that no one has stronger claims upon the liberality of the Government than herself, which her exemplary character through life greatly strengthens.

I trust her petition may be granted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. G. MCCAWLEY,
Colonel Commandant.

Hon. W. H. HUNT,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, District of Columbia.

C.

HEADQUARTERS MARINE CORPS,
ADJUTANT AND INSPECTOR'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1882.

SIR: In reply to the request of the honorable Secretary of the Navy for a full report of the service of the late Major Levi Twiggs, United States Marine Corps, referred by you to me, I have the honor to state as follows:

Major Levi Twiggs was commissioned second lieutenant United States Marine Corps 10th November, 1813; promoted first lieutenant 18th June, 1814; captain by brevet 18th June, 1824; captain, 23d February, 1830; major, 15th November, 1840; killed in battle 13th September, 1847, at storming of Chapultepec, Mexico. He was continuously in service from the date of his first commission to the date of his death, and took part in three wars of the United States. His total sea service was about three years.

In the engagement between the President and the Endymion (war of 1812-'14) Lieutenant Levi Twiggs, commanding the marines of the former vessel, particularly distinguished himself. (Aldrich, History United States Marine Corps, page 58.)

Captain Levi Twiggs was an officer of the battalion of marines which bore an honorable and highly important part in the battle of Hatchee-Lustee, and participated in arduous campaigns under General Jesup in the Indian war in Florida in 1836-'37, and received from him the highest commendations.

Major Twiggs was selected, to my personal knowledge, to lead the storming party at Chapultepec, Mexico, on account of his well-known gallantry and devotion to duty, and fell in the performance of that duty, in my presence.

Major-General Quitman, United States Volunteers, in his report dated at the National Palace, city of Mexico, September 29, 1847, gives the following account of the work accomplished by the marines, under the lead of Major Twiggs, in that action:

"During the day I succeeded under cover of our batteries in making an important reconnaissance of the grounds and works immediately at the base of the castle. The supporting party on this reconnaissance was commanded by the late Major Twiggs, of the marines, and sustained during the observation a brisk fire from the batteries and small arms of the enemy, who, when the party were retiring, came out of the works in large numbers and, although repeatedly checked by the fire of our troops, continued to advance as the supporting party retired until they were dispersed with considerable loss by several discharges of canister from the guns of Captain Drum's battery and a well-directed fire from the right of the Second Pennsylvania Regiment, posted on the flank of the battery for its support. During the day my command was re-enforced by a select battalion from General Twigg's division, intended as a storming party, consisting of thirteen officers and two hundred and fifty men and non-commissioned officers and privates, chosen for this service out of the Rifles, First and Fourth Regiments of Artillery, Second, Third, and Seventh Regiments of Infantry, all under the command of Captain Silas Casey, Second Infantry.

"At dawn on the morning of the 13th the batteries again opened an active and effective fire upon the castle, which was returned by the enemy with spirit and some execution, disabling for a time the eighteen-pounder in Battery No. 1, and killing one of the men at the guns. During this cannonade active preparations were made for the assault on the castle; ladders, pickaxes, and crows were placed in the hands of a pioneer storming party of select men from the volunteer division, under command of Captain Reynolds, of the Marine Corps, to accompany the storming party of one hundred and twenty men, which had been selected from all corps of the same division and placed under the command of Major Twiggs, of the marines.

"Perceiving that all the preliminary dispositions were made, Major Gladden with his regiment having passed the wall by breaching it, the New York and Pennsylvania regiments having entered over an abandoned battery on their left, and the battalion of marines being posted to support the storming parties, I ordered the assault at all points.

"The storming parties, led by the gallant officers who had volunteered for this desperate service, rushed forward like a resistless tide. The Mexicans behind their batteries and breastworks stood with more than usual firmness. For a short time the contest was hand to hand; swords and bayonets were crossed and rifles clubbed. Resistance, however, was vain against the desperate valor of our brave troops. The batteries and strong works were carried, and the ascent of Chapultepec on that side laid open to an easy conquest.

"In these works were taken seven pieces of artillery, 1,000 muskets, and 550 prisoners, of whom 100 were officers, among them one general and ten colonels.

* * * * * * *

"The command of the storming party from the volunteer division devolved on Captain James Milles, of the Second Pennsylvania Regiment, by the death of its chief, the brave and lamented Twiggs, of the Marine Corps, who fell on the first advance at the head of his command.

"Captain Roberts, of the rifle regiment, who had led the advance company of the storming party at Chepultepec, and had greatly distinguished himself during the preceding day, was detailed by me to plant the Star-Spangled Banner of our country upon the national palace. The flag, the first strange banner which had ever waved over that palace since the conquest of Cortez, was displayed and saluted with enthusiasm by the whole command.

"The palace, already crowded with Mexican thieves and robbers, was placed in charge of Lieutenant-Colonel Watson, with his battalion of marines. By his active exertions it was soon cleared and guarded from further spoilation."

Adjutant Baker is mentioned by the general "as conspicuous for his bravery and efficiency."

The letter of the honorable Secretary and accompanying papers are returned herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AUG. S. NICHOLSON,
Major, United States Marine Corps, Adjutant and Inspector.

THE COLONEL COMMANDANT UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS,
Headquarters, Washington, D. C.

Your committee find that there is a precedent for this in the case of the widow of Major Robert Anderson, and perhaps there are others, which, taken with the facts that the petitionor is past eighty-one years of age, and is poor, and that few families have done so well in furnishing our country with defenders—none better—leads your committee to make a favorable report.

Mr. RANDALL. I am here at the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] to ask that that bill be reported favorably to the House. The services rendered by this family are most remarkable in the history of this country.

Mr. STEELE. She had nine male relatives and lost them all.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY J. WEST.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 455) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. West.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Mary J. West, widow of Commander William C. West, a pension at the rate of $30 per month, subject to the limitations and provisions of the general pension laws, the same to be in lieu of the pension which she is now receiving, and to commence from the passage of this act.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 455) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. West, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

Your committee have carefully examined the papers in this case on file in the Pension Office, and find that the facts are fully and fairly stated in the report of the Committee on Pensions in the Senate, which we adopt, and which is as follows:

"That a similar bill was reported favorably to the Senate in the Forty-sixth Congress by the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

"'That it appears from the evidence in this case that the petitioner is the widow of William C. West, deceased, late an officer of the United States Navy; that said William C. West entered the service of the Navy as a midshipman in 1841; that he was promoted at various times during his long and continuous service, and at the time of his death at Washington, D. C., in June, 1879, he was on the retired list with the rank of commander, he having been placed on the retired list in 1877. It also appears from the records of the Navy Department and the certificate of Navy surgeons who attended him at the time of his death, that he died of rheumatism affecting the heart and stomach, for which he was placed on the retired list, and which was contracted in the line of duty.

"'The medical records of the Department show that Commander West was under treatment at various times during his service. His widow, the petitioner, is now drawing $10 per month pension, it having been decided by the Pension Bureau that she was pensionable under the general law, the only question being as to whether the pension should correspond to the rank of the officer at the time of death or to his rank at some former time during his service when the disease was supposed to have been contracted. Under a ruling of the Department it appears to be held that the pension should correspond to the rank when the disease which ultimately caused death was contracted; and it was held in this case that the disease was contracted or originated in 1853, at which time Commander West was treated for rheumatic fever.

"'The medical records of the Navy Department are very full in this case, and it appears that the officer was frequently under treatment for short periods all through his service, and that from an early period in his service he suffered occasionally with acute attacks of cardiac neuralgia, and during the intervals was seldom free from a dull pain about the heart with sharp pains shooting along the bronchial nerves. It would seem, however, that his condition was not sufficiently bad to prevent his rendering efficient service, until finally, in 1879, his rheumatic disease terminated in death. There appear to be no data of value as to when the disease occasioning death did originate, and your committee are of the opinion that the pension should correspond to the rank when the final attack took place which occasioned his death.'"

The committee adopt the foregoing report; recommend that the bill be amended by adding thereto the words "the same to be in lieu of the pension which she is now receiving, and to commence from the passage of this act," and, as thus amended, pass.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY N. GUNN.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2635) granting an increase of pension to Henry N. Gunn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Henry N. Gunn, late a member of Company B, Seventh Regiment Michigan State Volunteers, to $18 per month.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out "eighteen" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NORTON L. NEWBERRY.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2634) for the relief of Norton L. Newberry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Norton L. Newberry, late a member of Company A, Fourth Regiment United States Light Artillery Volunteers, from $8 to $24 per month.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out "eight" and insert "eighteen," and to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-two."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RALPH P. FORD.

The next pension business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 984) for the relief of Ralph P. Ford.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ralph P. Ford, late of Companies K and B, Third Regiment Missouri State Militia.

The bill was reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BROWNE. We have got to the end of the pension bills ready for action. The order of the House includes also House bills on the Speaker's table returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. They have to be referred to this committee before they can be taken up.

Mr. BROWNE. I move, then, that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

SALARIES OF SENATE AND HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to offer, for consideration at this time, the resolution which I send to the desk. It will take but a moment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be in order when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the ensuing fiscal year is under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to submit amendments to said bill looking to an equalization of salaries of the employés of the House with those of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that hereafter; but at this time I feel warranted in calling the regular order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It will take but a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it come in after the tariff.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will say to the gentleman it will create no discussion and take but a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it come in hereafter. I make my objection absolute. I do not propose to discriminate as to individuals or subjects.

APPROPRIATION FOR FUEL, LIGHTS, ETC.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call up the joint resolution which I reported last night from the Committee on Appropriations, making an appropriation for certain deficiencies; notably the one for fuel, lights, and water. The appropriation is exhausted, and the supplies are being cut off and the service impaired in the city of New York.

Mr. RANDALL. If that is not the regular order, I object.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution was left pending last evening in the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is indispensable to pass it.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 204) making an appropriation for fuel, lights, water, &c., for the fiscal year 1882, and for other purposes.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for fuel, lights, water, and miscellaneous items required in the proper care of all the public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, the sum of $60,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

For contingent expenses of the office of the Secretary of War, such as blank-books, stationery, labor, books, maps, gas, and miscellaneous items, $2,000.

For contingent expenses of the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army, such as fuel and gas, ice, office furniture, painting, glazing, and plumbing, and repairs for building numbered 1725 F street northwest, $500.

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia may apply the amounts appropriated for the payment of the salaries of teachers of public schools for the present fiscal year in conformity with the schedule of salaries recommended by the board of trustees of public schools, and approved by the commissioners, and under which the teachers for the present fiscal year were appointed and have received monthly payments from September to February last inclusive.

Before the Clerk had completed the reading of the resolution,

Mr. RANDALL said: How does that resolution come here?

The SPEAKER. It was reported last evening.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not a general appropriation bill and has no special right. I call the regular order. Let that come in afterward.

Mr. HISCOCK. I insist that this is the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. In what way? Under what rule?

Mr. HISCOCK. This is an appropriation which requires immediate consideration. It is a part of the general appropriations for the Government, and as such is the regular order.

Mr. COX, of New York. The service cannot get along without it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state this joint resolution was reported by unanimous consent last evening, with notice, without objection, that it would be called up for consideration this morning.

Mr. RANDALL. I know it is right, but let it come up afterward. I do not withdraw my objection. If I am ruled out, that is the end of it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will complete the reading of the resolution.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the resolution as above.

Mr. HISCOCK. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the War Department building for 1882, being for gas, soap, sponges, repairs, painting, and miscellaneous items, $2,000.

The amendment was adopted.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Amendment numbered 105:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 105, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the end of said amendment the following: "And section 2056 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows: 'Section 2056. Each Indian agent shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly appointed and qualified;'" and the Senate agree to the same.

Statement in explanation of the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 4185, Indian appropriation bill for 1883:

There were fifty-six amendments before the conference. They recommend that the Senate recede from eleven, the House recede from twenty-two wholly, and from twenty-three with amendments.

The money amount of these amendments is $543,800, of which the Senate yielded $255,200 and the House yielded $288,600, leaving the amount appropriated by the recommendation of the report $5,217,803.91; the amount recommended by the bill as it passed the House, $4,920,203.91. The effect in detail upon the amendments, if the report is adopted, will be as follows:

On amendment numbered 2: It increases the salary of the agent at the Uintah agency from $1,000 to $1,500.

On amendment numbered 3: It releases the agent at the Navajo agency from the duties of teacher, and provides that no other money appropriated by this act shall be expended for clerical labor at this agency.

On amendment numbered 9: Increases the salary of the agent at the Quapaw agency from $1,200 to $1,500, and provides that not more than $1,000 of any moneys appropriated by this act shall be expended for clerical labor at this agency.

On amendment numbered 11: Reduces the salary of the agent at the White Earth agency from $1,800 to $1,600.

On amendment numbered 24: Corrects total of amount appropriated for agents' salaries.

On amendments numbered 15, 16, and 17: Reduces the amount for pay of interpreters from $25,000 to $20,000, and strikes out the limitation upon the annual pay of an interpreter employed east of the Rocky Mountains, and leaves section 2072 of the Revised Statutes repealed, as in the original text.

On amendment numbered 32 as follows: "That the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated out of the $300,000 reserved by the third article of the treaty with the Choctaws and Chickasaws concluded April 8, 1866, for the purpose of educating freedmen in said tribes, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, three-fourths thereof for the freedmen among the Choctaws and one-fourth for the freedmen among the Chickasaws: Provided, That said sum of $10,000 shall be deducted in like proportion from any moneys in this act appropriated to be paid said Choctaws and Chickasaws: And provided further, That either of said tribes may, before such expenditure, adopt and provide for the freedmen in said tribe in accordance with said third article, and in such case the money herein provided for such education in said tribe shall be paid over to said tribe, to be taken from the unpaid balance of the $300,000 due said tribe."

On amendments numbered 33 and 34: To make the clause read as follows: "For settlement, &c., of Kickapoo Indians in the Indian Territory, lately removed from Mexico, including the purchase of stock, $8,000," and makes the total amount correspond.

On amendment numbered 35: Strike out the words "except the per capita shares due the family of Sepequah, or Jane Drake, nine in number, the same to be retained in the Treasury for their benefit," and leaves the amendment thus: "For payment to the delegation of the Miami Indians of Kansas, now or recently in Washington, the sum of $1,000, to reimburse them for money expended in 1881, to be paid out of any funds belonging to said tribe and to be immediately available; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay per capita to the Miami Indians of Kansas, now residing in the Indian Territory, the amount found due said Indians at this date on account of proceeds of sales of their unallotted lands in Kansas, as provided by the act of March 3, 1873, the same to be immediately available."

On amendments numbered 78, 79, 80: Increases Indian police from 800 to 1,000, and from $70,000 to $82,000 for pay, and rejects the proviso that none of the money shall be used to pay police among the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory.

On amendments numbered 81 and 82: Rejects proposition to pay special police to prevent liquor traffic $5,000, and to appropriate $5,000 for schools among the Seminoles in Florida.

On amendment numbered 91: To read as follows: "And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause to be constructed, at a point in the Indian Territory adjacent to the southern boundary of the State of Kansas and near to the Ponca and Pawnee reservations, and upon a section of land suitable in quality and location, for the industrial purposes of said school, which section of land is hereby reserved for said purpose.

On amendment numbered 93, as follows: "And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized and directed to provide for the care, support, and education of one hundred Indian children not belonging to the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory, at any established industrial, agricultural, or mechanical school or schools other than those herein provided for, in any of the States of the United States, such schools to be selected by him from applications made to him, at a cost not exceeding $167 per annum for each child; and for this purpose there is hereby appropriated the sum of $17,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That not more than twenty of said pupils shall be educated in any one State.

On amendments numbered 95 and 96: Rejects the proposition to erect a school building on the Cœur d'Alene reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, $5,000; and appropriates $5,000 for similar purpose, the building to be erected on the Northern Cheyenne and Arapahoe reservation in the Indian Territory.

On amendment numbered 103: Provides for payment of defending suits against the North Carolina Cherokees $1,000 out of the funds in the Treasury belonging to said Indians.

On amendment numbered 105: Provides as follows:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to employ, temporarily, sufficient clerical force to effect a prompt settlement of the accounts of Indian agents which have been unduly delayed, $4,000, to be immediately available; and section 2056 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "Section 2056. Each Indian agent shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is duly appointed and qualified."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. KASSON. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

F. E. FOLSOM.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior recommending the payment of the claim of F. E. Folsom, a Choctaw Indian, on account of a depredation committed by a white man, a citizen of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

TARIFF-COMMISSION BILL.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2315) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the order of the House adopted on yesterday, by which the privileges of debate under clause 5 of Rule XXIII are limited to such amendments only as are substantive in their character.

Mr. CARLISLE. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is entitled to the floor this morning on his amendment. Before he proceeds I desire to submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the first section, so that it may be pending.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let it be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That a select committee is hereby created, to be known as the tariff committee, to consist of nine members of the House of Representatives, to be chosen as hereinafter provided.

Mr. KASSON. I will reserve all points of order on that amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to submit an amendment, and ask that it be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "interest," in section 3, insert the following:

"Excepting all laws or parts of laws affecting and fixing the rate of duties on molasses, melada, and sugar."

Mr. KASSON. That amendment is not in order now.

Mr. DUNNELL. I only give notice of it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I offer an amendment, and ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read for information only.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill so revising the tariff as to make it conform to the principle that revenue shall be the only standard for export duties.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say once for all that I reserve all points of order upon these several amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that these amendments are read only for information; they are not considered as pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to submit a proposition, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this bill be recommitted, with instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means to report within thirty days a bill to amend section 3022 of the Revised Statutes, so as to read as follows:

"The following-named imported articles in bond may be used under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to wit:

"Salt used in curing fish taken by vessels licensed to engage in fisheries, and used in curing pork, beef, and other provisions.

"Paper used in printing newspapers, magazines, and books.

"Tools used by mechanics, agricultural implements, and all machinery used in farming.

"Educational and religious books, engravings, and other printed matter, bound or unbound, used for educational purposes.

"All articles used in medicinal preparations.

"And upon proof that the articles have been used for the respective purposes mentioned the duties on the same shall be remitted."

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to give notice that I will introduce at the proper time an amendment, which I ask to be now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the second section by inserting after the word "commission," in line 4, the following:

"Not more than five of whom shall be members of one political party, and a majority of whom shall be a quorum."

The CHAIRMAN. If no other gentleman desires to present amendments to be read for information, the Chair now will recognize debate on the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] The amendment will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

"Two of whom shall be members of the Senate, and be appointed by the President pro tempore of that body; three of whom shall be members of the House of Representatives, and be appointed by the Speaker of the House; and four of whom shall be from civil life, and be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Also, strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and the first seven words of line 4 of section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the latter clause of his amendment is not in order at this time, the second section not having yet been reached.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I desire to add anything nor do I believe it necessary to add anything to what I said on yesterday touching this amendment. The object I had in view in offering it was to make provision that the results of this commission should have responsible sponsors on the floors of the respective Houses of Congress. With that statement I have nothing further to say so far as I am individually concerned.

If any gentleman desires to speak in opposition to the amendment, of course under the agreement adopted by the House yesterday he can do so for five minutes. So far as I am concerned I am ready for a vote on the amendment. And if no one wants to speak against it we can take the vote at once.

Mr. KASSON. I have but a single word to say. I regard this amendment as one which will, if adopted, interfere very seriously with the objects sought to be accomplished by the bill in the short period between the time when it shall become a law and the first Monday in December next, when the report must be made to Congress. I therefore hope that the friends of this measure will see fit to leave the bill in the form in which it was reported from the committee.

It will be difficult to find Senators and Representatives who during the heated canvass of the next summer can give the requisite time to this subject; nor do I believe they would bring to the investigation of the facts that impartial judgment which we shall obtain if civilians be selected irrespective of political associations and not at all from political life. I hope, therefore, the House will reject the amendment.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR.]

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I am entirely opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I think that the discussion we have had must have satisfied every member that it would be impossible to select from this House a committee that could do the proper amount of work in addition to their regular labors. For instance, if I should undertake to select from this House a man apparently eminently qualified for the work I should choose my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE;] yet I am satisfied from the debate that he is entirely inadequate to the occasion. I judge from the fact that his mind is poisoned with the doctrine of percentages. If gentlemen will recollect his speech, the mathematical portion of it from beginning to end ran on the question of percents. In other words, he argued if one man drinks a bottle of champagne which is taxed only 40 per cent. and another man eats salt on his potatoes and the salt is taxed 50 per cent., then the gentleman from Kentucky would have us believe that the salt tax is onerous and oppressive in comparison with the champagne tax, while in point of fact the man who drinks one bottle of champagne pays tax enough to furnish the other man with all the salt he can eat during his lifetime should he live to be one hundred years old. The rich man may pay more tax on one suit of clothes than is paid on the suits of one hundred poor men, and yet the percentage would not show it at all.

My friend was cured of this per centum business in 1872 during the Greeley campaign. You all recollect how our Democratic friends treated the percentages every time there was an early election. There was a little town in Maine that had given only one vote for Seymour, and it gave three for the Democrats in the State election. Their head-lines read, "A gain of 200 per cent. for the Democracy!" So every State election was in that way figured as a per centum gain for Greeley; until finally the man whom they employed to do their figuring struck a town in Massachusetts that gave three votes for the Greeley party. They looked back and found that the same town had not given a single vote for Seymour. The dividend was three and the divisor was zero. "Now," said our Democratic percentage mathematician, "if my mind is not bewildered I have struck the infinite." [Laughter.] Poor fellow, he landed in an asylum; and we all know where the percentage gains landed the Democracy.

That is the doctrine which our friends would apply to the question of the tariff. I say, therefore, it is not safe to trust this great work with even the ablest men in this House on the commission. Why, sir, I have sat here and been overwhelmed with figures, long tables, for over a month, as I told you the other day I had been by the figures of the Greenback party, which furnished us with one constant flow of mathematical tables. I was cured of this mathematical mania when a small boy. I think I was not over twelve or thirteen years old when the "Millerites" came round. By figuring from Daniel the Prophet they made it out with mathematical exactness that the end of the world would come at precisely such an hour on the 15th of April, 1843, I believe that was the date. Table after table as constructed by them came out the same way. Figure it what way you would, the result was the same; the fatal day was mathematically certain. Yet when the 15th of April came the world kept right on turning on its axis and wheeling along in its customary course around the sun. The trouble was the Millerites had no real basis for their calculations; their tables were imaginary. Why, sir, I recollect that before the resumption act passed—[here the hammer fell.] I will have to conclude these remarks upon another amendment.

Mr. REED. For the first time in this debate, I move that the gentleman's time be extended. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I offer, as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the following:

All of whom shall be taken from the Senate and House in the proportion of five to the House and four to the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. Is not debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is exhausted on the amendment; the gentleman from New York moves an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have but very few words to say in favor of this amendment. I do not mean to debate it. In the hurry of voting upon these propositions, we cannot reargue the questions to any extent. When my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] reconciles oats with salt, I will debate with him. I do not see what his figures with reference to the millenium have to do with this business just now.

But, sir, I think it is a foregone conclusion that the bill of my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will pass. All that we on this side can ask is a record. We cannot of course have the yeas and nays in the Committee of the Whole, but I ask members on both sides to allow us to have the yeas and nays in the House on these various amendments. We are opposed to a commission to be appointed in any way outside of Congress. All those who are in favor of a commission to be made up of men delegated by the people to revise the tariff will vote for my amendment; all who are opposed to such a commission will vote the other way.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I am opposed to any amendment that proposes to change the make-up of the commission which this bill, as originally framed, is designed to create. The bill in this respect is well digested, and it seems to me to need no amendment in that respect.

When last on the floor I was about saying that this mathematical part of the question has its peculiarities. I recollect that just before the resumption act took effect, the Greenbackers of the country proved conclusively, as they thought, by their tables, by long statistical figuring, that if such legislation went into effect the whole country would go to ruin.

I recollect that financial distress was in every column of their figures, and financial ruin in all their footings. [Laughter.] You all remember it; and yet resumption came, and instead of ruin good times came also. New manufactories sprang into existence all over the country. Business was revived. Prosperity became universal.

So I say to you gentlemen here: for the past thirty years you have been giving your mathematical tables and showing that the United States was on the sure road to ruin. Has not this been your constant prophesy? I say that has been the substance of all your arguments, of all your wailings. And yet to-day, Mr. Chairman, no nation on the face of the earth has a better record for all its multiplied industries than the United States.

Why, sir, I stated a proposition in the few remarks I made upon the agricultural bill which covers this whole case if it be true. I stated this: that there never was a time in the history of this country when a farmer could take a load of poultry, potatoes, wheat, everything he raises on his farm, and carry home from market in exchange therefor as many of the necessities of life as he can to-day. I stated another proposition, that there is not a nation upon the face of this earth where a laboring man can take his day's wages and buy as many of the necessaries of life as he can right here in the United States.

Now, sir, if these two propositions are true, and I challenge any man to dispute them, then this whole mass of mathematics melts into thin air. These two propositions admitted, and all this talk about protection injuring the farmer and the laboring man is completely answered. It is for the benefit of both these classes that a protective tariff should be justly levied in this country.

Why is it, if we are in such distress here, as these freetraders tell us, that people are flocking to our shores from all countries of the Old World by hundreds of thousands? It is a sinking ship that rats leave; they never seek to get into one that is filling with water. So with these people from the old countries, they migrate for the purpose of benefiting themselves. They seek new homes where their condition will be bettered. They know they are leaving low wages for higher wages, poor living for better living. You cannot fool them on this question. Their constant arrival on our shores is sufficient answer to all the speeches we have heard about low wages here.

Mr. Chairman, what we want in this country is a commission of able men, men of large knowledge and great experience, not to tear down the tariff, not to bring about the millennium of free trade, but simply to ascertain facts and report to this House their investigations, so that we may adjust the tariff in an intelligent and sensible manner.

I would like to leave it to our Committee on Ways and Means; but, sir, my faith in that committee has been somewhat shaken by this debate. I remember when a lad I had a peculiar veneration for preachers. When they visited the house of my parents I always regarded them with a feeling of awe. I thought, you know, they held in some way the key to the great mysteries of a future life. But as I got older I lost that feeling in a measure, that sense of awe, but according to the great law of compensation, which causes a man to make up in one direction what he loses in another. [Laughter.]

I came to look upon the members of the Committee on Ways and Means in the same way. How many times in the gallery, when I had been describing the distinguished men of this House, picking out their peculiarities, I would run on a snag in some cases, but when I struck a member of the Committee on Ways and Means the job always became free and easy. [Laughter.] "Ah! that is a member of our Committee on Ways and Means." [Laughter.] That would end the question at once. [Laughter.] Everybody always said, "That is enough."

And now that feeling of reverence has faded away, been torn out by the roots, as the result of this debate, gone—all that deep sense of awe, that veneration, all gone. [Laughter.] I have a feeling now that that committee, composed of many able men, is not fully up to the mark on this tariff question; I do not know what they might do on a commission. I do know what they have done in this debate. We have been arguing this commission bill for over a month, and my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] spoke two hours and a quarter without hardly referring to the bill. [Laughter.] I was on the point of moving that a tariff bill should be introduced and then if we could have got the gentleman on his feet, perhaps we might have had a speech from him on the commission. [Laughter.] I submit, Mr. Chairman, we do not want to amend this bill at all. It should be passed just as it comes to us.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I propose to amend my substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania so as to make the five members of the commission from the House and four from the Senate elected by each body.

Mr. RANDALL'S amendment was read, and the amendment of Mr. COX, of New York, was read as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] as it has been modified.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 100.

Mr. ATKINS demanded tellers.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask my friend from Iowa whether he would not consent to give us the yeas and nays on this proposition in the House?

Mr. COX, of New York. I insist on tellers.

Mr. KASSON. I am not authorized to make any arrangement of that sort. I ask that proceedings in committee be carried on in the ordinary way.

Mr. COX, of New York. Allow me to conduct my substitute in the proper way. I appeal to my friend from Iowa in order to avoid tellers in committee to agree that we shall have a vote by yeas and nays in the House.

Mr. KASSON. No; let us take a vote by tellers in committee. That will consume less time than the yeas and nays in the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. Cannot it be taken in both ways?

Mr. KASSON. The result will be the same in both ways and we will make record enough in the Committee of the Whole.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COX, of New York, and Mr. KASSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 114.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. UPSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an amendment to that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the persons to compose such commission shall be selected, as nearly as practicable, from the two political parties; and shall, as nearly as practicable, be chosen as representatives of the different interests to be affected by a readjustment of the tariff.

Mr. KASSON. Is that offered as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it to be offered as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. UPSON. I offer it as an amendment to come in at the close of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard upon the amendment?

Mr. UPSON. I do not.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. KASSON. If it were necessary now to raise the question of the admissibility of this amendment under the Constitution I should do so, but I believe the Speaker has ruled that it is admissible. I would simply like, however, to remind gentlemen of the committee of the provision of the Constitution——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. This, I understand, is on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Iowa as making a point of order.

Mr. KASSON. I desire simply to call the attention of the Chair and of the committee to the question as to whether the point of order may properly be made under this clause of the Constitution:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. KASSON. It seems to me that under this clause of the Constitution it is very questionable if any member of the House can be appointed to such a position if any emoluments or pay shall be connected with the office.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think that this is a civil office within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks debate is entirely unnecessary upon the point of order, as the Chair is ready to rule upon it. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I was going to say that if it should have been held otherwise by the Chair I would have proposed a modification of the amendment, or another amendment, providing that the members so appointed on the commission should receive no additional compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky for the first section will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert "that a select committee is hereby created, to be known as the tariff committee, to consist of nine members of the House of Representatives, to be chosen as hereinafter provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that if this is offered, as it would seem from the language, as a substitute for the whole bill, it is not properly in order.

Mr. CARLISLE. It is offered as a substitute for the first section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The necessary correction, then, will be made in the language.

Mr. CARLISLE. It should read, "strike out all after the enacting clause in the first section, and insert," &c.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. There is no enacting clause in the first section.

Mr. KASSON. I reserve the point of order upon this amendment.

Mr. CARLISLE. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, simply that the principle involved in this amendment has been already discussed during the progress of the general debate upon this tariff-commission bill. I am one of those who believe—and I think that there are a number of gentlemen on this side who agree with me—that we ought not to have a commission of civilians or a mixed committee of members of the House and of the Senate to consider this matter, but that it is a right which belongs to the House alone, and cannot properly be delegated. In that view I have proposed the amendment to the first section, which presents the simple naked question for the consideration of this committee, whether it will provide in this bill for the appointment of nine members of the House of Representatives to take into consideration all of these matters and report their conclusions to the House instead of one or the other of the plans which have been suggested.

If this amendment shall be adopted, then I would propose a further amendment to the second section, providing for the manner in which the nine members shall be chosen; and they ought not, of course, to have any compensation beyond what they are entitled to receive as Representatives under the laws now in force. They will not be independent officers but will act upon it as they act here upon the floor of the House, and as they act upon all other matters, in their representative capacity.

I want this committee to vote upon that one single naked proposition, whether the House of Representatives charged with the duty under the Constitution of originating all matters pertaining to the revenues of the Government will delegate that power entirely to a commission selected by the Executive or partly to a committee selected by the House and Senate combined, or whether they will hold that power in their own hands. And upon its adoption I would like to have a vote in the House.

Mr. KASSON. I think the point of order is good against this proposed amendment, as it is a modification of the constitutional right of this House, or to some extent a delegation of the power of the House to a co-ordinate branch of the Government to appoint a select committee to be chosen from the House; that, in other words, an amendment of this kind proposes the substitution of a law, requiring the action of both bodies and relating to persons outside of Congress, to do that which is within the power of the House alone, and resulting from its proper action under its rules, namely, its power to appoint its own special or standing committees.

Mr. CARLISLE. Upon the point of order I desire to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa make his point of order now for the first time?

Mr. KASSON. I reserved it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman from Iowa reserved the point of order this morning, as I understand.

I concede, of course, it would be out of order to attempt to convert a bill into a concurrent resolution, or even a simple resolution of the House, and if that were the effect of the amendment it would be subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa. But there is no proposition in the amendment to change the character of this measure. It still remains a bill, and it ought to remain a bill for the reason that it creates, even after the adoption of the amendment proposed by me, new officers and provides for their compensation and makes an appropriation of money to pay them. It makes an appropriation for the expenses of the committee and for the compensation of a stenographer and messenger, two new offices not now known to the law.

It is true the House could by a simple resolution of its own give authority to one of its committees to sit during the vacation, to visit different parts of the country, to employ necessary officers, and to pay them, not out of the general funds of the Treasury, but out of the contingent fund of the House. But this measure proposes to pay them out of the public Treasury in the way that all public officers are paid. Therefore it is properly a bill, and not a simple resolution of the House, and the amendment proposed by me does not suggest or require any modification of its character.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say a single word. I have now the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky in my hand. It is for the appointment of a select committee, composed exclusively of members of the House. The Constitution says each House shall regulate its own proceedings, including all the scope of this amendment; and the proposition is to cede away that power and call for the concurrence of the Senate before we shall appoint a select committee. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CARLISLE. I submit that the point made by the gentleman from Iowa is not strictly a point of order addressed to the Chair; but it is a matter which relates to the form of the measure we propose to pass in order to accomplish a certain result. It being clearly within the power of the House to accomplish that result, we have a right to put the measure in any form we choose. The very fact that the House itself has the power to regulate its proceedings and to provide for the appointment of its committees necessarily involves the proposition that the House may do that in any way it chooses; and especially when it is proposed to make an appropriation of money out of the public Treasury, and not out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. KASSON. I submit the point that the amendment is not germane either to what follows in the bill or to the section itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the proposition to be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first section, and insert: "That a select committee is hereby created, to be known as the tariff committee, to consist of nine members of the House of Representatives, to be chosen as hereinafter provided."

Mr. COX, of New York. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. While the point of order is pending an amendment to an amendment would not be in order.

This amendment proposes to provide for a select committee of the House of Representatives. Under the rules of the House the power of appointing committees is vested in the Speaker of the House. The Chair thinks a proposition of this kind is not germane and is not in order in this bill, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CARLISLE. With great respect for the Chair, I feel compelled to appeal from its decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. COX, of New York. Permit me one word to sustain the appeal of my friend from Kentucky. It seems to me if we can by law choose anybody to do this work for us we can choose men of our own body equally well with men outside of our body. We could choose men in the Treasury, men in the Senate; we could reach out anywhere and get competent men for the work, if we chose. We could authorize anybody to take charge of this business. This does not come under our rules exactly. It is a law, a joint resolution, if you please, and it seems to me it cannot be ruled out of order simply because we name men who are members of this House and not men outside of this House.

The question being taken on the appeal from the Chair's decision, there were—ayes 108, noes 59.

So the decision of the Chair, ruling the amendment out of order, stood as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. COX, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first section the following:

"Provided, That five members of said commission shall be elected by the House of Representatives, each member voting for three citizens not members of the House, and that the five citizens having the highest vote shall be declared elected."

Mr. COX, of New York. That is in order to make it impartial

Mr. KASSON. Question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard?

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir. I presume that will be appreciated by all on this side at least.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first section the following: "Of this House, who shall serve without other compensation than their salaries as Representatives."

Mr. KASSON. I make the same point of order on that as on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the section as it will read if amended as proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a commission is hereby created, to be called the tariff commission, to consist of nine members of this House, who shall serve without other compensation than their salaries as Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] makes the point of order.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. What point of order?

Mr. KASSON. I will not take up time by insisting on the point of order, and withdraw it. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be heard?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. No, sir.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 59, noes 100.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I call for tellers. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] if he will consent that we may have a vote on this proposition in the House and so avoid tellers at this time?

Mr. KASSON. I cannot agree to that.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Then I call for tellers and hope they will be ordered, and then I trust that members on this side of the House will not vote unless we can be allowed a vote in the House.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, and Mr. KASSON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 16, noes 133.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to offer an amendment, and ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be read for information.

The Clerk began the reading of the amendment, as follows:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means——

Mr. KASSON. Let us go on with the bill; that is not now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to its being read for information?

Mr. KASSON. I object to its being read now. The proper time is after we have concluded the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will then read the second section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint nine commissioners from civil life, one of whom, the first named, shall be the president of the commission. The commissioners shall receive as compensation for their services each at the rate of $10 per day when engaged in active duty, and actual traveling and other necessary expenses. The commission shall have power to employ a stenographer and a messenger; and the foregoing compensation and expenses to be audited and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend the section just read by inserting, after the word "commission," in the fourth line of the printed bill, the words "not more than five of whom shall be members of one political party, and a majority of whom shall be a quorum." If that amendment should be adopted, that portion of the section will read:

That the President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint nine commissioners from civil life, one of whom, the first named, shall be the president of the commission, not more than five of whom shall be members of one political party, and a majority shall be a quorum.

The words which I propose to insert here are precisely the same as contained in the bill authorizing the appointment of the Utah commission; except that the Utah commission bill provided for five commissioners, and the number of one political party was three, whereas this bill provides for a commission of nine members, and my proposition is that the number to be appointed from one political party shall be five.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would ask the gentleman, if these members are to be selected from different political parties, how he can discriminate, in our own party for instance, between protectionists and those on the other side? That is what bothers me. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know that there are any protectionists per se in the Democratic party; there ought not to be, at any rate. If the President is authorized to make the appointment in the manner which this amendment indicates, I take it for granted that he will in good faith carry out this provision by appointing well-recognized representatives of the Democratic party on the minority of this commission. I ask gentlemen on the other side if it is not fair, if we are to have a commission to investigate the tariff question, that both the great political parties shall be represented upon it, and that not exceeding five of the commissioners shall be members of the dominant party in the country.

This proposition is one which originated with the majority of this House when providing for the appointment of the Utah commission. It is just and proper. This proposition is one in the same line, asking that there be fairness in the appointment of a commission of this kind.

Gentlemen may say that this is not a political or a party question. If they have entertained that idea heretofore or during this debate they must abandon it now. They will remember in the last Presidential campaign, when the cry went up from all parts of the country, from gentlemen on the other side and their friends, that it was claimed that an administration should be elected in the interest of a protective tariff. Upon that claim they went before the people in the last Presidential election, and they tell us that they won upon it.

Now, I can assure them that in the election of members of the Forty-eighth Congress this question will go to the people, and a Congress will be elected on this question. The Democratic party will place itself upon the position of reducing the present exorbitant rates of taxation proposed by the tariff law. We therefore desire that there shall be a representation of both parties on this commission, so that we can be fairly represented.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman consent to modify his amendment so that one of the commissioners shall be taken from military life? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know that military gentlemen are members of any political party. [Renewed laughter.] I have no objection, however, that the majority may select their five members from whatever walks of life they may see fit. I have not a particle of objection to that.

Mr. KASSON. I only wish to say that I hope the President will see that a proper business man associated with the Democratic party, or more than one, shall be on the commission. I object to limiting the exact number of Democrats that he shall put on. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. This does not do it; it says that not more than five shall be members of one political party.

Mr. REED. But you want those five to be members of two political parties.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. SPRINGER; and upon a division there were—ayes 33, noes 97.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, and the existing system of internal-revenue laws, upon a scale of justice to all interests; and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it, said commission, in the prosecution of its inquiries, is empowered to visit such different portions and sections of the country as it may deem advisable.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Ways and Means was to strike out of the seventh line of the section the words "and the existing system of internal-revenue laws."

Mr. WHITE. I desire to ask whether this is not an amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. KASSON. The Senate bill is not now before us. This is an amendment proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means to the House bill.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to inquire whether this amendment, if adopted, will not necessitate an amendment of the title of the bill, and whether one-half of the whole question which was proposed to be referred to this commission will not be taken away from it?

Mr. KASSON. I will say in answer to the gentleman that the Committee on Ways and Means decided to introduce themselves a bill abolishing all internal taxation except upon three articles—distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco. That bill the committee did afterward report. In view of their purpose with reference to that bill they amended this bill, preferring, as the internal taxation is limited as to the number of articles taxed, and is more thoroughly within the knowledge of members, to confine the investigations of this commission to the more elaborate questions of the tariff. I hope the House will concur in this amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the House will not adopt the amendment. If this commission is to investigate simply the tariff laws and not the internal-revenue laws, then in my opinion we do not want any commission at all. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope the House will understand what it is voting upon. The Committee on Ways and Means reports an amendment striking out the words "and the existing system of internal-revenue laws;" so that if the amendment be adopted this commission will not touch that subject.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. COX, of New York. You do not want to touch it?

Mr. VALENTINE. No.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do. Therefore I will vote against striking out these words.

Mr. RANDALL. Everybody who wants to reduce internal-revenue taxation should, in my judgment, vote to adopt the amendment proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. WHITE. Everybody who wants to vote for the "whisky ring" should vote for the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to learn from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] how he discovered that this House was incompetent to consider the question of the tariff, but is competent to consider the question of internal-revenue taxes.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 95, noes 24.

Mr. WHITE. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE and Mr. VALENTINE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 130, noes 17.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. KENNA. I move to amend by inserting after the word "interests," in the eighth line of the pending section, these words: "and a modification of the internal-revenue laws so far as the same relate to tobacco, with a view to the relief of producers thereof."

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed, as the amendment itself states, to have an investigation of this question with a view to the relief of tobacco-growers. Members of the House are familiar with the fact that under existing laws the producer of tobacco is the only agriculturist in the country who is not allowed to dispose of his product as he chooses. I trust there will be no objection to allowing this commission to make inquiry in the direction indicated, and to submit to Congress suggestions looking to a modification of our laws, so as to afford relief to this overburdened class of producers.

Mr. KASSON. That will be done, I hope, at an earlier period in this House than it could be through the medium of this commission; and the adoption of the amendment would change the whole plan as now embodied in the bill. I presume that in the course of a week we shall have up in the House on a bill from our committee the question presented by the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. KENNA. As I understand it, the relief which my amendment seeks is not provided for in the bill to which the gentleman refers. I doubt the probability of any early action on this question by the House, as I have already expressed doubt as to the probability of early action here in regard to the tariff; so that unless this subject be referred to the proposed commission there will be no relief afforded. From no quarter is there more just demand for relief than from the tobacco-growers who are not permitted, as are other classes of producers, to dispose of the product of their own toil as they choose. I trust the amendment will be adopted. It will remedy a great wrong. But if defeated here I shall endeavor to secure its adoption when the bill on the Calendar is taken up for consideration.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to say a few words upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. KENNA. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, this amendment presents a most important question. There is great and just complaint among the growers of tobacco that under existing laws they cannot take their product to market and dispose of it according to their own choice, as do the producers of wheat, corn, &c., but can only sell it to licensed dealers, who have a monopoly of the market. If I am not mistaken, sir, one of the effects of this bill must be (if it was not intended to accomplish that object) to postpone the consideration of the tariff question, in order to make great and vital reductions in internal-revenue taxation, doing away with the greater portion of our revenue under that system, and thereby making an excuse for retaining or increasing the present tariff duties in order to supply the deficiency.

I want to say here and now, unless we can totally and absolutely repeal the internal-revenue laws I hope no change will be made, except such as will have the effect of relieving the farming as well as all other industrial interests. If we are to continue the revenue laws by which persons can be harassed and persecuted by indictments, and sufficient revenue only is obtained for the purpose of maintaining this inquisitorial system of persecution, and to compel those who are thus persecuted to pay for their own indictments and all the expenses of this unjust persecution, I should not for one vote for any reduction of the internal-revenue laws.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on that motion.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to renew that amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. Let the gentleman move to strike out the last two words. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the vote shall be taken again, and before the question is submitted to the committee I wish to say a word.

Mr. McKINLEY. I object to debate.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky to move to reconsider the last vote. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels it to be its duty to inform the gentleman from Kentucky that under the order of the House of yesterday no debate can be allowed even if he makes that motion.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa who has charge of this matter to allow an amendment in the House on this important measure.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to say a word in regard to the amendment now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman oppose the amendment?

Mr. WHITE. No, sir; I desire to say a word in favor of it. The reason I am in favor of it is this—[cries of "Vote!"]—we do not want this commission if it is to be so hampered that it will do no good.

Well, I withdraw my amendment, and demand a division on the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 93.

Mr. WHITE. No quorum has voted. This is the most important amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE. I insist no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can demand tellers.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE and Mr. VALENTINE were appointed.

Mr. WHITE. I do this thing, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the poor and oppressed. If gentlemen will give us a vote in the House I will withdraw my call.

Mr. KENNA. I hope that gentlemen on the other side will consent to let us have a vote on this proposition in the House.

Mr. WHITE. As gentlemen seem indisposed to vote on this proposition I withdraw the call, as it is quite certain the majority in the House is against it.

Mr. KENNA. I renew it.

Mr. WHITE. I want to vote with the gentleman, but I hope he will get somebody on that side of the House to vote with me.

Mr. KENNA. I am pursuing my own course in reference to the amendment, and I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not object to giving us a vote on this proposition in the House. There is no purpose on this side to filibuster on the amendment, but I would like to see a vote in the House on it. I say now there will be no attempt in the House to cause any delay in reference to it.

Mr. KASSON. I will say in reply to the gentleman from West Virginia that an arrangement was entered into yesterday, with repeated assurance on the other side of the House there would be no filibustering on this subject, and I stand on that agreement.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman is aware that I am not disposed to filibuster, for I am for his bill.

Mr. WHITE. I had no desire to filibuster, and I withdrew the call. What I have done has been in the interest of the poor and oppressed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot withdraw the call, as it was made by another.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to make a statement to the gentleman from West Virginia, which I think will settle this matter. When the revenue bill was before the committee on Ways and Means I introduced an amendment identical with that now pending, and it was understood when that bill was reported to the House I should have the privilege of moving that amendment. We can get a vote on the substantial proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia on the revenue bill.

Mr. KENNA. When we reach that bill I have no doubt we can get a vote; but we will never reach it this session.

Mr. WHITE. I withdraw the call.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been made by another gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. I want the whole matter referred to a commission so it may be considered with a view to the relief of the poor and oppressed.

Mr. KENNA. I insist the gentleman shall observe the rules of the House.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 22, noes 130.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRISON. I offer a proviso, to come in at the end of section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, Said commission shall report no revision of the tariff providing for any duty in excess of 50 per cent. ad valorem on any article embraced in the following schedules of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes, and not subject to tax under the internal-revenue laws, to wit: schedule A, cotton and cotton goods; schedule B, earths and earthenware; schedule C, hemp, jute, and flax goods; schedule E, metals; schedule F, provisions; schedule G, sugars; schedule I, spices; schedule L, wool and woolen goods; and schedule M, sundries.

Mr. KASSON. I will reserve the point of order upon that.

Mr. MORRISON. What is the point of order?

Mr. KASSON. This bill is for the investigation of subjects connected with the tariff. This prohibits a report upon a certain branch of inquiry.

However, instead of taking up the time of the committee on the point of order, I will yield to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. MORRISON,] and withdraw the point against the proposed proviso.

Mr. MORRISON. The only remarks which I desire to make are to ask the Clerk to read a statement of the reduction of duties on the basis of present importations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Schedules.	Articles.	Duty received, 1881.	Estimated loss of duty.
A	Cotton and cotton goods	$2,287,413 96	$234,577 96
B	Earths and earthenware	1,943,894 54	713,579 42
C	Hemp, jute, and flax goods	960 57	133 57
E	Metals	5,265,789 45	1,714,311 77
F	Provisions	1,059,284 76	553,554 91
G	Sugars	46,321,781 14	4,602,164 53
I	Spices	825,981 86	174,987 05
L	Wool and woolen goods	24,511,508 58	6,149,752 23
M	Sundries	4,014,351 53	918,681 35
	Total	86,230,966 39	15,061,742 79

Mr. MORRISON. That would be on the basis of present importations.

Mr. McKINLEY. As to one item contained in the gentleman's amendment, that of pottery, if it should become a law and guide this commission by its command, there is not a pottery establishment in the United States that would not be compelled to close out. This proposition if adopted would be a severe blow at this great interest in the United States. I am unalterably opposed to it.

Mr. MORRISON. This does not reduce the duties.

Mr. McKINLEY. I know it; but it provides that the tariff shall not exceed 50 per cent. ad valorem. Two potteries in New Jersey within the past few days have closed out for want of adequate protection.

Mr. CARLISLE. Does the gentleman not know that the present rate is only 40 per cent.?

Mr. McKINLEY. I have so stated.

Mr. MORRISON. Do you propose to increase that rate above 40 per cent.? Do you propose to increase duties?

Mr. McKINLEY. I do. It ought to be done, and I do propose to increase it if this House will stand by me.

Mr. COX, of New York. In answer to my friend from Ohio——

Mr. KASSON. I wish to oppose the amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let me say a word.

Mr. KASSON. I have only the remainder of the time in opposition, and I would prefer not to yield.

Mr. COX, of New York. Simply 40 per cent., that is all——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York favor the amendment?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire the time?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two minutes of the time remaining.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is one of the anomalies of our business here that we are trying to instruct the commission. My friend from Iowa withdrew his point of order so that the wisdom of this House might reach this possible commission. We seek to give them some information, some instructions from the people through their representatives, and because we want to keep these rates down to 50 per cent. my friend from Ohio says "No; I want it 40, or more." Forty per cent. every time anything made abroad comes into this country in competition with what we make here! They propose to tax the consumer in this country 40 or 50 per cent. always, and we cannot instruct the men we are creating, these possible creatures to our power, to receive a poor 50 per cent. [Applause.]

Mr. McKINLEY. We get our pottery cheaper.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know pottery has been more or less under a hot-house growth like iron and other industries of this country, but I want this commission, if the House sees fit to enact this bill, to take in detail each item of the tariff. We struck off forty millions in 1872 in detail, but we may not give this commission "information" or "instructions." Is that the position that gentlemen want to assume? The people are overborne by commissions. They are overborne by the peculiar traditions of men who represent capital against labor; but I see that my two minutes have expired, and therefore I will desist. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. I know of no better illustration of the impracticability of an amendment like this than has been this moment furnished. There is no one point of agreement that exists touching the rate that is proposed to be limited upon these importations. This is an anticipation of the facts to be reported upon by the commission. It is an attempt to mortgage the judgment of the commission upon these points. It is mortgaging the future action of the House. It defeats the object of the commission by seeking to burden their recommendations and their action on the subjects specially intrusted to them.

The very idea of the commission is, it shall be free to report what in its judgment it shall see proper to be confirmed or rejected by our judgment. And I think that my friend from Illinois himself appreciates the inconsistency of a law like this with the purposes of the bill, which is for a pure investigating commission. I hope not an argument for free trade or for protection will be found in their report. We want facts; and all the arguments necessary can be furnished in the House in the future as they have been in the past. I hope for that reason this amendment may be rejected. I hope on some of these things the duty may be even less than that which the gentleman allows; but I oppose any restriction such as this puts upon the freedom of the judgment of the commission to be established.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the amendment may be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 95.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. REAGAN and Mr. VALENTINE were appointed.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the call for further count.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5 of section 3, after the words "United States," insert these words: "excepting all questions relating to the importation of sugars into the United States."

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the section be read as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, and industrial interests of the United States, excepting all questions relating to the importation of sugars into the United States, &c.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have opposed the pending bill from the beginning because it will work a delay in the revision of all the revenue laws of the country, and especially certain revenue laws which in my judgment ought to be revised. This, in a single sentence, has been my attitude. It is my attitude now.

There are none of the revenue laws that so much need immediate revision as the laws regulating the importation of sugars. Many years ago the Dutch standard was adopted. It became unreliable. The Secretary of the Treasury issued an order providing for the use of an instrument called the polariscope. Sugars have been rated for a number of years by the use of the polariscope. Since this bill has been pending in the House the Supreme Court of the United States has decided it was not lawful to use this instrument, and the Secretary of the Treasury appeals, as every Secretary for the last five years has appealed, to Congress in begging terms to relieve that Department from the practical operation of the laws regulating the importation of sugars.

Last year we collected forty-five, nearly forty-six millions of dollars of duties upon sugar. In the speech which I made in this House I insisted, and I do now insist, that we are raising too large a proportion of our revenues from this great article of common consumption. Next year the revenues will be not less than $55,000,000; more than one-fourth of the revenues from foreign importations will come from sugar alone. We do not need this amount.

Why do I offer this amendment? We have now, Mr. Chairman, in the Committee on Ways and Means in bound volumes every argument that can possibly be made to this commission, every fact that can come home to this commission, already in possession of the committee, upon this whole sugar question. If we leave this out it will be notice to the Committee on Ways and Means forthwith to bring in a bill relieving the people at least of 25 per cent. of the amount now collected on sugars. We have already a dozen suits pending, and this one decision of the Supreme Court has taken out of the Treasury about a million and a half. The Department is crippled in the execution of the law. The Dutch standard has ceased to be a just standard, and during the year to come the Treasury Department will be utterly powerless to repress frauds upon the Treasury.

The great mass of our sugars for the year to come without legislation will come in under No. 7, and there will be therefore in that way a reduction perhaps to the importers and no saving to the people. My position here upon the tariff-commission bill has been somewhat severely criticised by certain gentlemen upon this side of the House. But my attitude was forced upon me because of this one thing, among others, a great patent wrong staring the House of Representatives in the face, demanding relief, demanding revision, and we putting it off into the dim and uncertain future. I did say then, and I say now, that no Congress has a right to put off into the future what it is within its power to do now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. A single word. I only wish to say what the gentleman from Minnesota well knows, that the Committee on Ways and Means can act to-morrow upon this if it is the wish of the House or of the committee; whether this amendment be put upon this bill or not makes no difference.

I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.]

Mr. DUNNELL. Will not the gentleman yield to me one moment to reply to what he has just stated?

Mr. KASSON. I have not time.

Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in the present debate, for it does not properly embrace any other question than this: Whether we will authorize the appointment of a committee of experts to examine all the facts relative to the tariff and to submit them to Congress. It will be merely a preliminary inquiry, proper in itself, whatever may be our views, however we may differ on the principles upon which the tariff should be adjusted, when we come to deal with that question. But the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota, to except sugar from this inquiry, and the remarks he has made in favor of reducing the tariff upon sugar, is so extraordinary that I will be pardoned if I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment. The gentleman complains that we are deriving too much revenue from sugar, and upon this ground demands that the rates should be lowered. There is no complaint that the price is high, none that the sugar interest—the labor and capital invested in this industry—are receiving more than their fair proportion of the benefits of the tariff; none that overproduction has been caused, but simply that too much revenue is derived from this source.

It will be admitted by everybody that under any possible system of customs duty, whether you have a tariff for revenue only, with incidental protection or for the sake of protection, so long as we have a public debt, a pension list, and the Government to provide for, there will be necessary a certain amount of protection, a certain bounty, in favor of American industry. The question is simply this: Is it philosphical, statesmanlike, or just to give all the benefits, all the bounties to the capital and labor engaged in manufactures and commerce and to exclude agriculture from the benefits?

Is it not better that capital and labor should distribute themselves according to the laws of supply and demand as little affected as possible by governmental action, and that a system of taxation should be adopted that will equalize the benefits and burdens between the three great pursuits, manufactures, commerce, and agriculture, as well as between all classes and all sections of our common country? Even if we should attempt to distribute these bounties in the fairest possible manner, even if we lift ourselves above particular prejudices and special interests, and deal with this question in a liberal and national spirit, it will be found impossible to attain to an exact equilibrium. But what sort of statesmanship is that which would exclude an article from all the benefits under a system which from the beginning of the Government was steadily fostered until after the year 1861? Why exclude the article of sugar from the same treatment you accord to the other schedules of the tariff?

I only ask, as one of the Representatives of a State that formerly produced 50 per cent. of all the sugar consumed in our country, and to-day only produces 10 per cent. of the consumption, just treatment. Give us the protection that interest uniformly received until 1861, from the beginning of this century, and that State will produce all the sugar you can consume, and save the ninety millions of gold you pay out every year for sugar to countries that buy nothing, or little or nothing, in exchange from us. The gentleman complains that we are receiving too much revenue for sugar. The reason is obvious. The finest sugars are being imported and being colored down under the Dutch standard tariff, at the lowest rates of duty, so that the ad valorem is not more than half the schedule rates, which, while they average 60 per cent. ad valorem, do not in fact equal 30 per cent., the rate established by the Robert J. Walker tariff of 1846.

You have in fact a tariff for revenue only on sugar. For every eight dollars collected seven go into the Treasury and one only to the laborers and capital in this industry. But how is it on cotton, iron, copper, and woolen goods? How upon steel? In some instances absolutely prohibitive; in others, where eight dollars are collected seven go as bounty to the particular industry and only one to the Treasury. Do you propose now to throw sugar overboard, to reduce the revenues, to break down this industry, and thereby to make up the deficiency by increasing the rates upon manufactured goods? In this you deceive yourselves. If you reduce the duties to a level with those upon sugar you will increase the revenues of the country.

The difficulty about the sugar tariff, to prevent fraud or evasion, can be remedied by a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ the polariscope or other means to ascertain the real color and saccharine strength of sugar, without increasing or lowering the rates, correcting the methods without touching the rates upon sugar. But if you wish to reduce the revenues of the country you can do it by either raising the tariff on sugar or by reducing it on the other industries on which it is above the revenue standard, fully protective or absolutely prohibitory.

There ought to be equity in this tariff system. You ask for protection against the underpaid laborers of England and the continent. Will you not afford equal protection to the freedmen of Louisiana and the freemen of that State against the unpaid labor, the slave labor of Cuba and the gang or cooly labor of the tropics, that is still more exacting? Is it your policy to discriminate against English competition when we have the Atlantic Ocean to protect us, and not discriminate against the slave-owners of Cuba, which is as near New York and the centers of consumption in our country as Louisiana?

You open wide our ports for free sugar from the Hawaiian Islands, thus offering a bonus to the worse than slave system, the bond-contract system under which the Chinese are bound to the cupidity of the planters. Such a policy in favor of slavery and against freedom violates every sentiment of justice and every instinct of our nature.

It cannot be defended either upon principles of political economy or those other principles which should find an advocate in the heart of every American statesman—freedom and justice against slavery and injustice, American freedom against Cuban slavery and Hawaiian coolyism.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. DUNNELL; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to amend section 3 by inserting after the word "interests," in line 8, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And in conformity to the following principles:
First. The repeal of the duties on raw materials.
Second. The proportionate reduction of the duties on articles manufactured from raw materials thus placed on the free list.
Third. No duties to exceed 50 per cent., except those on luxuries.
Fourth. No internal-revenue duty to be imposed on alcohol used in manufactures.
Fifth. Where practicable, duties to be made specific by converting ad valorem into specific duties on the basis of average market value.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not propose to discuss this amendment. It is in exact accordance with the line of remarks which I had the honor to address to the House, and of the spirit of the petition which I presented from eight hundred business firms of the city of New York. My object is to have it appear on the record and to have it adopted, if it can get votes enough.

Mr. KASSON. This amendment is subject to the same objection which I have proposed to the other proposition, that it restricts the freedom of action and of the reports upon the facts found by this commission. I wish the House to stand upon that principle. I will only say that the report of the chamber of commerce to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] alludes was carried by so small a majority in a free-trade body like that that it hardly gives force to his proposition.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] misapprehends me. I said that my amendment was in conformity with a petition signed by over eight hundred business firms of the city of New York. I do not refer to the action of the chamber of commerce.

Mr. KASSON. I understood the gentleman to refer to that chamber, which I presume to be an honorable representative of all the commercial interests of New York. The resolutions referred to by the gentleman from New York were carried——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They were carried, and after full discussion.

Mr. KASSON. They were carried by a vote of 33 to 29 in the chamber of commerce.

Mr. COX, of New York. The chamber of commerce does not represent the laborers of the country.

Mr. McCOOK. The city of New York is the largest manufacturing city in the Union, employs more capital and gives employment to more men and women than any other city.

Mr. KASSON. I leave the objection where I put it, that this amendment violates the principle of a free commission.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HEWITT, of New York; and upon a division there were—ayes 42, noes 88.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to amend section 3 by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the said commission be, and is hereby, instructed to include the following provisions in any plan for revision of the tariff reported by it:
1. From and after the —— day of ——, 1883, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on iron bars for railroads or inclined planes, and on steel railway bars and railway bars made in part of steel, $14 per ton. On chains, trace-chains, halter-chains, and fence-chains made of wire or rods, 35 per cent. ad valorem. On plows, harrows, spades, shovels, hoes, mattocks, picks, axes, hatchets, scythes, sickles, cutting and hay knives, reaping-hooks, on anvils, blacksmith's hammers and sledges, axles or parts thereof, on files, file-blanks, rasps, and floats, augers, gimlets, saws of every kind, and all knives used in any mechanical trade, and upon all other tools and implements used for agricultural, mechanical, manufacturing, and mining purposes, of which iron or steel is a component material of chief value, and upon anchors or parts thereof, and iron cables or cable-chains, 35 per cent. ad valorem.
2. On all flannels, blankets, hats of wool, and knit goods, and upon all other articles named in schedule L of section 1163, title 33, of the Revised Statutes, the duties therein prescribed, so as that no duty on any of said articles, whether specific or ad valorem, shall be at a rate of duty greater than an equivalent rate of 45 per cent. ad valorem.
3. On all articles subject to duty under schedule A, section 2504, title 33, of the Revised Statutes, a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem.
4. On all articles subject to duty under schedule G of the said title the present rates of duty with the present classification shall be levied, collected, and paid, but so as that no duty on any of said articles shall be at a rate of duty greater than an equivalent rate of 45 per cent. ad valorem.
5. On salt in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, six cents per hundred pounds; in bulk three cents per hundred pounds, provided however that such duty shall in no case exceed an equivalent rate of 25 per cent. ad valorem.
6. The following articles shall be admitted free of all duty:
Barks: Quilla, Peruvian, Lima, calisaya, and all cinchona barks, canella alba, pomegranate, croton, cascarilla, and all other barks not otherwise provided for, wherever grown or produced.

Mr. KASSON. I was going to make the point of order upon that amendment that it was enacting a law in a bill proposing simply an investigation. But in view of the fact that it is proposed by one of my colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means I will submit it to a vote without making any point of order upon it.

Mr. TUCKER. There are one or two branches of the amendment which do not mention the articles to which they apply. One of them is in reference to the duty on cotton manufactures. I propose to put it at 30 per cent., which is the duty imposed by the high tariff act of 1842. I propose also that the duty on flannels and blankets and other woolen goods shall be 45 per cent. That I believe, upon my examination of the question, will be not only not injurious to the woolen trade but greatly beneficial to the interests of the consuming classes of the country.

Without detaining the committee with any further discussion upon it I will ask a vote on my amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. TUCKER; and upon a division there were—ayes 37, noes 79.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to amend by adding to the pending section the proviso which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, Said commission shall report no revision of the tariff providing for duties in excess of the several duties and rates of duty imposed by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1861, entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports and for other purposes," and known as the "Morrill tariff," on any of the following articles not subject to tax under the internal-revenue laws, namely:

On all manufactures of cotton of which cotton is the component part of chief value.

On all wools, hair of the Alpaca goat, and other animals, and all manufactures wholly or in part of wool or hair of the Alpaca, and other like animals.

On all iron and steel, and on all manufactures of iron and steel of which such metals, or either of them, shall be the component part of chief value.

On all metals not herein otherwise provided for, and on all manufactures of metals of which either of them is the component part of chief value.

On all spices.

On beef, pork, hams, bacon, cheese, wheat, butter, lard, barley, Indian corn, and fish.

On hemp, manilla, jute, flax, and all manufactures thereof.

On all glass and glassware.

On all wood and manufactures of wood.

On all articles embraced in schedule M, sundries, of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to amend by inserting the following:

That said commission for revising the tariff shall make it conform to the principle that revenue shall be the only standard for customs dues, and that no rate recommended shall exceed 30 per cent. ad valorem, and that in so far as possible all rates of duties shall be based on ad valorem and specific rates.

I do not expect a favorable vote on this amendment from the other side of the House, but I want this question met with a view to the election next fall. I want none of the gentlemen on the other side to be absent when this question comes up again.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by adding to the third section the proviso which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President shall appoint as members of said commission well recognized representatives of the various interests of the country, as follows:

Four commissioners to represent agricultural interests.

One commissioner to represent the persons employed in the building and operating of railroads.

One commissioner to represent the persons employed in the manufacture of iron and steel and of cotton and woolen goods.

One commissioner to represent the manufacturers of such goods.

One commissioner to represent the persons employed in other mechanical occupations.

One commissioner to represent the manufacturers of agricultural implements, stoves, and the various kinds of machinery.

Mr. SPRINGER. My reason for offering this amendment is, that if we must have a commission I desire it shall as nearly as possible represent equally the various interests of the country. The section as it stands instructs the commission to take all these interests into consideration; and it seems to me fair that a commission thus instructed should represent as nearly as possible the respective interests to be affected.

The amendment gives the larger number of this commission to those interested in agriculture. The census shows that nearly one-half of the people of the United States are interested directly or indirectly in agricultural pursuits. Hence this great interest ought first to be considered, and four members of the commission should be well recognized representatives of this interest. They are apportioned by my amendment as nearly as possible according to what the census shows to be the numbers and importance of this interest. Gentlemen on the other side have told us how much agriculture is protected by the present tariff, and how much they desire to promote the interests of the farmer. I wish to see whether they are willing that the farmer shall be represented in a matter so materially affecting his interests.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to say just a word in opposition to the amendment. The honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] proposes that the interests of the farmer shall be promoted by placing on this board four representatives of that interest; and then he proposes to complete the board by placing thereon five men who shall be special representatives and attorneys of certain special interests.

This he proposes to send out to the country as a fair commission to revise the tariff—a board the majority of whom shall be special pleaders in behalf of special interests, every one of them committed to his own peculiar industry. That is the proposition. The gentleman proposes that in this commission one representative farmer shall be "snowed under" by five representative special pleaders of special industries. That is his idea of Democratic reform in revising the tariff.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not ask for the farmers any greater proportion of members on this commission than their numbers entitle them to. The word "attorney" is not used in the amendment; the gentleman invented that word. The term employed in the amendment is "well-recognized representatives."

Mr. HASKELL. The gentleman might as well call them attorneys.

Mr. SPRINGER. "Well-recognized representatives" is the language of the amendment. The gentleman from Kansas proposes——

Mr. HASKELL. To have nine fair men selected to look after the various interests of the country.

Mr. SPRINGER. Who is to judge of the fairness of these commissioners, unless you let the persons interested in these employments be the judges? My amendment limits the number of representatives from all these employments, while it secures a sufficient recognition to every interest.

Mr. DUNN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] by adding, "and one commissioner to represent the Constitution of the United States." [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The Constitution is already abolished by this bill; so that there is no necessity for the amendment.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, no proposition is ever made here in behalf of the farmer without gentlemen trying to laugh it down as a joke. Why, sir, even if one farmer on this commission is to be "snowed under" by the other members of the commission, let us at least have one farmer upon it rather than none. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] has stated that the farmers are to have one representative who will be "snowed under;" but the amendment in fact proposes four such representatives. If we can get four, let us have four. But gentlemen on the other side do not want any representative of the farming interest; and we shall not get any if their votes are to control this question. The farmer is to be choked down, as has been done heretofore.

Mr. HERBERT. The effect of this proposition would be to put a Democrat on the commission.

Mr. DUNN. To comply with the terms of the amendment, he must be a Democrat. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the amendment,

Mr. DUNN (while the affirmative side was being counted) said: I call attention to those who are the friends of the Constitution.

During the taking of the negative vote,

Mr. DUNN said: I now call attention to those who are the enemies of the Constitution. [Laughter.]

The result of the vote was announced—ayes 30, noes 73.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for a division on that amendment, as I want to see how many friends of the farmer there are in this House.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 91.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MURCH. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Not less than one member of said commission shall be selected from those actively engaged in some mechanical pursuit, and another member of said commission shall be taken from those actively engaged in agriculture.

Mr. BLAND. Is that amendment subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BLAND. I move to insert, instead of one, "six members engaged in agriculture."

Mr. MURCH. I accept that amendment as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. BLAND. If there is any class of our community to be affected by this tariff commission, or by tariff legislation, it is the agricultural class. Indeed no other industry could exist but for the agricultural interest. The prosperity of this country is dependent upon the prosperity of the agricultural interest. We saw that during the days of the panic and hard times from 1873 to 1878–'79. Although we had a high tariff, the present tariff, upon the statute-book, when we had legislation protecting all other industries, yet they were insufficient to counteract the depression of the agricultural interest that occurred during that period. It was not until abundant crops, not until a demand in the foreign markets for the products of our farmers, not until the prosperity of the agricultural interest was brought about by abundant seasons and a fair market, that we again marched upon the road to prosperity, independent of your tariff laws.

Inasmuch as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] and other gentlemen on the other side of the House have undertaken to criticise gentlemen on this side for offering amendments providing that farmers should be represented on this commission, and based their criticism on the fact that a majority of the commission not being farmers it would amount to nothing, as the agricultural interest would be snowed under by the representatives of the other interests, if gentlemen were sincere in what they said then they will come forward and vote for this amendment. They will do that, Mr. Chairman, or they will stultify themselves and go to their constituents in that shape. I hope this side of the House will insist upon a vote, if not in this committee, at least in the House, and compel gentlemen to face their constituents when they go home by their record on this question.

We hear a great deal in this House and at the other end of the Capitol, especially do we hear it upon the stump when gentlemen go home and ask to be returned, of their devotion to the farmer: we hear a great deal of devotion to the agricultural interest by representatives here and elsewhere; but, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to the test in some way or the other that interest seems to have more friends and less done for it than any other class in the community. The amendment I offer will bring the whole question up for consideration. If the only objection which gentlemen can urge against the amendment is that the farmer would be snowed under because he would not have the majority in this commission, the modification which I have proposed will do away with that objection.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I move as a substitute the following——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. KASSON. I will hear the substitute read.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move the following as a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "interest," in line 8, section 3, the following:

"At least five members of said commission shall be well recognized representatives of agricultural interests, two of commerce, and two of mechanical and industrial interests."

Mr. MURCH. I accept that as a substitute for my proposition.

Mr. COX, of New York. I thank the gentleman from Maine, who represents the mechanical people of this country in a very able way.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman so far modifies his amendment as to accept it in lieu of his own, then the time for debate is exhausted.

Mr. MURCH. I withdraw my acceptance for the present.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move this substitute as to those who are to compose this commission to be created evidently by a vote of this House, for that seems to have been a foregone conclusion for the last four weeks. I consider not merely agriculture, not merely mechanics, or those arts which have given us strength, life, values, but that something should be done in the same way to collect the facts and make deductions in reference to our shipping and our commerce. Our shipping business is a lost art. We have no more ships under our flag. We have the coastwise trade because of our peculiar navigation laws, but in the last twenty years our shipping has gone. Why has it gone?

Gentlemen say it was the rebel cruisers in the war. Not at all. We have had no revival of this interest since the war; and if our ships had been destroyed by rebel cruisers more need was there that our ship-building should have gone on to supply that destruction. But it has not done so.

We have failed in the world as compared with other nations, and notably with Great Britain. Our ships are not one-fourth, and, if we count our steam marine, not one-seventh, of the tonnage of England. They carry less than one-fifth of our own trade, while Great Britain carries fully one-half of it. Where have our ships gone to? They have been sunk by the tariff; and that question, I say, is one that demands an investigation.

You have so arranged your tariff and revenue laws that you will not let us build ships, and your navigation laws say that we shall not buy our ships abroad. I have offered amendments to your tariff laws here that would enable us to buy our ships at an ad valorem rate per ton, so that we might get them from abroad and let them carry our commerce under our own flag; but you voted me down.

Your ship-building in Maine is a lost art; you have not even an apprentice there. Fifteen years ago when I went to Maine, to Bath and Kittery and around there, there was not a ship-builder that did not lay the destruction of the ship-building interests of this country to your tariff laws, which allowed Nova Scotia and the Clyde to promote their immense ship-building interests and produce ships at a rate 33 per cent. cheaper than you could do it.

The treaty of Washington forbade the same, as has been suggested by my friend from Maine. Gentlemen sneer about that. But are you New England men here in the interest of ship-building, or do you expect that that interest will be represented on this commission? Let us have such men as represent that interest properly upon the commission, and then we will know to what the failure is due and why our ship-building has become a lost art. We will be able then to know why it is that our flag is no longer seen either in the Orient or in the Occident, and why under our navigation laws it can only be seen along our own coast.

Gentlemen will vote for this commission. I know it. The commission is a fixed fact. You have the men picked out. There will be no liberal man on it. You cannot get a man on it who represents the ship-building interests, any more than you can the agricultural interest of the country. Gentlemen who hold seats here representing Maine, New York, and North Carolina, lake, Gulf, Atlantic, and Pacific coasts, that want the flag to float again over our own shipping had better give some regard to this resolution which I have offered in the shape of an amendment to this bill.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman from New York and to the House what without saying I think they all know, although not disposed perhaps to admit it, that if we entered for once upon the policy of designating the personnel of this commission we immediately strike the views of some interest adversely which would claim not to be properly represented upon it, and that consequently we had acted in bad faith toward them. The only alternative, in the judgment of the committee, in considering this measure was to leave it untrammeled, and allow every interest that open, fair, and free representation which could alone be given to it by the free exercise of the constitutionally authorized appointing power.

For myself I sincerely hope that the shipping interest will have a representative upon the commission. I hope and believe, as far as moral certainty goes, that our agricultural interest will be thoroughly represented upon it; that the commerce will be thoroughly represented; that manufactures will be represented upon it.

Mr. COX, of New York. How does my friend from Iowa know that?

Mr. KASSON. Just as my friend from New York knew that the personnel of the commission was a fixed fact. For myself I do not know nor do I believe that any one single man has yet been selected in that connection to be nominated to the Senate. But the gentleman assumes differently.

Mr. COX, of New York. I was only arguing a priori. I am not in the confidence of the Administration, like the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. I am very well satisfied that no man knows the name of any one person who will be selected by the President and sent in for confirmation to the Senate as a member of this commission; nor will you find a member here who has such information. I have heard a great deal of what I know to be demagogy upon this subject. Now, for myself, I represent the farming interest of this country as thoroughly as any man upon this floor. And I know from my own relations with the Republican party that they are equally desirous with the most ardent advocates of our great agricultural industries upon the other side to have those interests fully and carefully considered in connection with this commission. Certainly there is no man in this House who would be more ready to condemn it, if I believed for a moment that these industries would not be fairly represented in its formation, than I. But, as I have said, I believe that no man knows the name of any one who will be connected with this commission.

The point I make ——

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. KASSON. You have had your say. Do you want to ask a question?

Mr. BLAND. I do.

Mr. KASSON. Very well; I yield for that. Only be prompt, please.

Mr. BLAND. Go on. I will take my own time.

Mr. KASSON. So, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to both sides of this House. It is not a bill for demagogy. It is a bill to attain solid results that will be just to all interests of the country; and as far as possible all those great interests should be represented. You cannot apportion them in this way. You cannot say there shall be so many to represent one dominant interest and so many to represent another without injustice to some. Let us be fair and just, depending upon the exercise of the constitutional authority of the President and the confirmation of the Senate for arriving at the proper result.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Maine accepts my amendment.

Mr. MURCH. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York as a modification of my own.

Mr. COX, of New York. Did the gentleman from Iowa mean to apply the term demagogy to me? If so, I would like to know it.

Mr. KASSON. I referred to the proposition to give an extraordinary representation in this commission to the interests that have fewest objects to investigate. I did not refer so much to the gentleman from New York, although I think there was a little demagogy in his reference to the shipping interests.

Mr. COX, of New York. I wish you would take care of your farmers as well as I do of my shippers.

Mr. KASSON. I will.

Mr. COX, of New York. We will see that next year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] as modified by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. BLAND. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "five" and inserting "six."

The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] like some other gentlemen on this floor—for it is not the first time I have heard it—hurled in the teeth of the men who claim to represent the agricultural interest here the charge that they are demagoging. He claims to be a representative of the agricultural interest. So do I. All the interest I have, pecuniarily and otherwise, is in agriculture. That is my calling besides representing that interest here. And I hurl back with contempt and disgust the gentleman's insinuation in that respect.

I am here, sir, to represent an interest that, as I said before, is above any other interest in this Government. If the gentleman from Iowa is so well assured that the agricultural interests will have a predominant position on this commission why does he object to the amendment? If he is representing an agricultural constituency and desires the agricultural interest to be represented here as a dominant interest in this country, which it is, why does he object to an amendment to the bill that secures that position to the agricultural interest of this country?

Can the gentleman say that he relies upon the President to make these appointments? Has he knowledge beforehand whom the President will select upon this commission? Can he assure the House that the President will appoint a majority of this commission from the agricultural interest? If so, let him state that instead of getting up here and indulging in these unmeaning generalities.

I withdraw my amendment, and hope that of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] as modified.

Mr. MURCH. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MURCH and Mr. VALENTINE were appointed.

The Committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 86.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I offer as an amendment to the third section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 3 the following:

"No traveling expenses of said commission shall be paid until an itemized statement thereof shall have been submitted to and allowed by Congress."

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I think, considering the scandal that has frequently attended the expenses of traveling Congressional committees, we ought to have some such check as this.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 26, noes 81.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the third section the following:

"And no member of said commission shall directly or indirectly receive any pay or compensation, in any form whatever, for his services on this commission except that provided for in this bill; and any one violating this provision shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than $1,000, nor more than $10,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years."

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Considering the very large interests at stake and depending upon the report of this commission, I fear that persons may be hired to take places upon it, not for the pay that the bill may give, but for the pay the monopolists might furnish; and I desire to make the taking of any such extra pay a crime. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. There is no objection to the principle involved in the amendment; but I do not like the bill should convey an insulting intimation to the men who accept the service, that they may do what is here suggested. I will not object if the gentleman will be satisfied with the first part of the amendment:

And no member of said commission shall directly or indirectly receive any pay or compensation, in any form whatever, for his services on this commission except that provided for in this bill.

I deem it quite proper to admit that; but I hardly think it worth while to assume the gentlemen to be appointed will be such criminals that they can only be prevented from doing this by making it a penitentiary offense.

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me in his time I desire to say a word. I want to know if the Revised Statutes of the United States do not guard this sufficiently when they provide that men holding office under the Government shall not accept any pecuniary profit or payment in the discharge of their duties. And are not the criminal laws of the United States which cover our statute-book sufficient to guard us in this matter? I dislike the whole intimation of this amendment, not because the principle is not right, but I object to saying when we invite through the President and the confirming power of the Senate nine distinguished gentlemen of the United States to sit in solemn judgment upon a great question, the interests of the American people must in this way be hedged and guarded against them as if they were felons, in addition to the ordinary provisions of the statutes, which provide ample remedy for all abuses and punishment for all offenses.

I think, as a matter of good taste, for our own honor and our own dignity, and out of respect for the eminent gentlemen that we all know will be invited to occupy places on this commission, we ought not to enact a criminal code in a little bill providing for a civilian commission.

Mr. CARLISLE. I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] to yield his time to me.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I will do so.

Mr. CARLISLE. If it was not in bad taste to put such a provision in the Revised Statutes, applying to all the officers of the Government of the United States, from the highest to the lowest, I submit to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] that it cannot be in bad taste to put it in this bill.

Mr. HASKELL. It is because we have general provisions upon the subject that I desire to save these nine men from this special imputation.

Mr. CARLISLE. We are now about to create a special tribunal, a special commission, for the purpose of performing certain specified duties and no other. I have not examined the Revised Statutes with reference to that subject, and therefore I am not prepared to say whether the provisions there do or do not embrace the members of this commission.

I have heard it said that perhaps some gentlemen who are accused of being in the pay of English manufacturers would want to get upon this commission. I have heard it said that there were gentlemen in this country advocating a reform in the revenue laws who were supposed, at least by some, to be in the pay of foreign capitalists and foreign manufacturers. Now if any such man shall get upon this commission I want to see him punished.

I have heard things said in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means, in the presence of the gentleman from Kansas himself, which I thought convinced even him that there ought to be a provision of this kind inserted in this bill. I heard a gentleman say in that committee, and the gentleman from Kansas also heard him say it, that if it should turn out that any gentleman should be selected to serve on this commission who could not afford to give his services to the Government for the paltry sum of $10 a day provided for in the bill, he as a manufacturer would feel it his duty to contribute something to pay him.

Mr. HASKELL. I did not understand that, and I never heard a proposition in the Committee on Ways and Means that I would ever interpret to mean anything of the sort.

Mr. CARLISLE. The question was put to the gentleman referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, who now sits in front of me, [Mr. MORRISON,] whether he thought it would be right to put a person on that commission in the pay of manufacturers. He said: "Gentlemen, I do not want to be misunderstood about this; I will be frank and candid with you;" and then he proceeded to make the statement, if not in the very terms, at least in substance, the same that I have stated here. And the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] thereupon himself said that he was in favor of putting into this bill a provision which would prevent that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HASKELL. Hold on a moment; I will reply to that when my turn comes.

Mr. CARLISLE. I would not have alluded to that matter if the gentleman from Kansas had not risen in his place and said that in his judgment it would be bad taste and an insult to these gentlemen to put this clause in this bill.

You have a special provision of law against the gentleman himself, and against me and against everybody else in the service of the Government. What is there about these gentlemen who are to serve upon this commission which ought to exempt them from the same provisions of laws which are applied to all the rest of us?

I want to say this before taking my seat: I do not suppose that anybody will be paid to serve on this commission; but I say that persons might be paid to serve upon it. And my purpose in advocating this amendment is to make it a penal offense. That is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASKELL. I ask as a special favor of the House to be allowed to say a word.

Mr. CARLISLE. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to speak.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no occasion for objections; there are three minutes of the time allowed for debate.

Mr. HASKELL. With reference to the proposition made before the committee, (and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] I am sure, will admit that I am right,) I desire to say that there was a statement that it might possibly be that certain corrupt influences would be applied to this commission, coming from a given quarter, which was referred to. Against that supposition, and in view of it, the gentleman admitted that as against the corrupt influence of the free-trade league it might be that corrupt influence would come from protection quarters. He put one supposition against the other, and he went no further.

Mr. CARLISLE. Allow me a moment. The gentleman did not admit that it would be a corrupt influence at all.

Mr. HASKELL. I understood that it would be.

Mr. CARLISLE. But, on the contrary, he said that he had a right to contribute money for that purpose, and he openly avowed that he would not hesitate to do it.

Mr. HASKELL. Only when the fraudulent supposition was brought up did he make any counterbalancing proposition.

Now another proposition. I am entirely willing, if any gentleman can show any reasonable cause, as I said in the committee, that any such contingency as that might arise, if this Committee of the Whole feels that there is any danger of it, I will vote to put the provision in the bill. But the gentleman from Kentucky knows that the matter was solemnly deliberated upon in the Committee on Ways and Means, and the committee never for a moment regarded it as possible that such a provision was necessary, and therefore they failed to report it to the House.

Mr. CARLISLE. I never heard it referred to afterward.

Mr. REED. In order to discuss this question, I move to amend the amendment by making the term of imprisonment twenty years. Mr. Chairman, section 5451 of the Revised Statutes provides for the punishment of any person who offers a bribe to any "officer of the United States," or any one who is "acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official function." Section 5501 punishes "every officer of the United States, and every person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any official capacity," who accepts a bribe.

Mr. CARLISLE. Does the gentleman think it would be a bribe if a fund should be raised to pay for the services of one of these commissioners without any understanding as to his action?

Mr. REED. I am happy to state that according to my ideas of morality it would be a bribe. If the gentleman from Kentucky does not consider it a bribe I am surprised.

Mr. CARLISLE. Is it a bribe under the statute?

Mr. REED. It is a bribe under the statute, and every lawyer in this House upon reflection must admit that it is.

The gentleman from Georgia, being familiar with the statutes, should have known just what I have stated; so that the purpose and object of this amendment is not to throw any safeguard around the members of this commission or to protect the country, but to inflict an insulting imputation upon these gentlemen; to throw an imputation upon them before they are appointed, and inferentially to throw odium upon the very appointment of a commission. Now I submit that this is not right, and the proposition should not receive the consideration of this House for a moment. The object is to put us in the dilemma of apparently voting against protection from bribery. But the reason we shall vote against this amendment is because the morality of our ancestors provided long ago against this very thing, and if we should incorporate in this bill the amendment proposed, it would be understood by everybody in the country as a reflection cast upon these particular officers. I submit that there is not the slightest necessity for adopting the amendment.

Mr. KASSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] yield the residue of his time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON?]

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection whatever to the principle involved in this amendment. My only objection is that so plainly stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED,] that it aims to put odium upon the commission, and to make it unpleasant for the very class of men whom we wish to have appointed to take these positions. In the second place, there is no occasion for the amendment, because there is to be no final action by the commission to induce a bribe to be offered; every act of theirs will be reviewed in this House. In view of these two considerations, I hope the amendment will on reflection be voted down.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.]

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Before the gentleman proceeds I would like to read just one section from the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 5501. Every officer of the United States, and every person acting for or on behalf of the United States, in any official capacity under or by virtue of the authority of any department or office of the Government thereof; and every officer or person acting for or on behalf of either House of Congress, or of any committee of either House, or of both Houses thereof, who asks, accepts, or receives any money, or any contract, promise, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of any thing of value, with intent to have his decision or action on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding which may, at any time, be pending, or which may be by law brought before him in his official capacity, or in his place of trust or profit, influenced thereby, shall be punished as prescribed in the preceding section.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] who has just occupied the floor has enlightened the House by rereading what the gentleman from Maine had just read.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I read language which the gentleman from Maine omitted.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. He read section 5501.

Mr. REED. I referred to it.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The gentleman from Maine referred to it, but did not read the whole provision.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine finds a way out of this difficulty by attacking my motives. Who made him a judge of motives I do not know. Certainly if I offer as an amendment a proposition which strikes at anybody he has no right to attribute my action to bad motives. I say that sections 5451 and 5501 do not cover the case at all. The first aims at the giver of bribes, the latter aims at an officer who accepts a bribe; that is, a bribe to influence a man's action while he is an officer. You have to prove it was given to him while in office with an intent to influence his action and was received by him with an intent that it should influence his action. That would not touch the case of paying one of known views to become a commissioner.

Now, what I said was this: that I did not know who might be appointed on this commission, and I desired to place in the bill something that would keep men from going on it as the agents and representatives of monopoly. And the men who represent them, as a rule, will not take the compensation allowed by this bill with no other hope of reward.

If I were going to attribute motives I would say the small compensation put in this bill was with intent that the commissioners should receive outside pay. But I do not attribute motives to anybody.

I say, however, that the only way to secure absolute impartiality, the only way for the country to understand that no commissioner is the agent of any monopoly, of any trade of any kind, is that he must serve for this pay, and for this pay only, or be a criminal. And the only way to make him fear to receive any other compensation is to say it shall be a crime.

The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] when he first rose, said the only objection he had to the amendment was that I said it should be a crime. That is the whole purpose of it. I have no other purpose. I am deeply in earnest in that purpose of announcing to the world that I am unwilling that any man shall serve on this commission until I shall know he is so hedged about that he shall not be the paid servant of anybody but of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia. In speaking of his motives, if I used the term motive I should have said purpose. I say that the purpose and object of this amendment is not to guard us against the danger of bribed commissioners, but to throw odium on those commissioners in advance of their appointment, and after the explanation of the gentleman from Georgia I repeat the statement.

But I say that this law, which the gentleman from Michigan has read and which I quoted, would punish any man who was the paid agent either of monopoly or of anti-monopoly, whatever those expressions may happen to mean. And I state that any special imputations cast upon special officers or attempted to be cast is wrong at the very outset; that we should be governed by general laws; that we have already passed these general laws; that they are ample for the purpose, and that the introduction of them now must have some other purpose than the prevention of bribery, for that purpose has already been accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. REED. I withdraw my amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 107.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, and Mr. VALENTINE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 87, noes 99.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the commission shall report to Congress the results of their investigation, and the testimony taken in the course of the same, from time to time, and make their final report not later than the first Monday in January, 1883.

Mr. KASSON. I am instructed by the committee to move the following as a substitute for that section:

SEC. 4. That the commission shall make to Congress final report of the results of its investigation, and the testimony taken in the course of the same, not later than the first Monday of December, 1882, and it shall cause the testimony taken to be printed from time to time and distributed to members of Congress by the Public Printer, and shall also cause to be printed for the use of Congress 2,000 copies of its final report, together with the testimony.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment to the title recommended by the committee will be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff."

Mr. SPRINGER. I object, and yield to the gentleman from Missouri to move an amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to amend the amendment so it will read: "A bill to postpone indefinitely a revision of the tariff."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to move to strike out the clause "amend the title so as to read, 'A bill to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff.'" Then the title of the bill will remain as it passed the Senate providing for "a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws." This covers the entire ground, and I desire five minutes of debate on striking out this amendment reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to say that the amendment to the title has been agreed to, and the question is not before the committee.

Mr. WHITE. I rose to move an amendment and supposed I was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see the gentleman, and certainly did not recognize him. The gentleman from Missouri moved an amendment to the proposition of the Committee on Ways and Means and it was rejected, and then the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Without a vote. I was endeavoring to get the floor to debate the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to say that a vote was taken and the question decided in the committee without any objection, as far as the Chair was able to ascertain, on the part of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2315) to establish a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments and the recommendation that the bill and amendments be passed.

Mr. KASSON. I desire the attention of the House to ask unanimous consent to take the Senate bill from the Speaker's table for the purpose of moving to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what the House has now in committee determined upon.

Mr. MILLS. Before that I move to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. KASSON. I have not yet yielded the floor. I beg that gentlemen will understand my purpose in asking this is to expedite the business by one stage.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object, but reserve the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. All I wanted to say was that this would facilitate by one stage the disposition of this matter; but if gentlemen wish to obstruct its passage now after it has had fair consideration in the committee, I of course have no resource left. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. MILLS. I move to recommit the bill with the following instructions.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that I gave notice before that at the proper time I should make a motion to recommit the bill. I supposed by all the courtesies of debate I would be entitled to make that motion in preference to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas was the first who made any intimation to the present occupant of the chair that he would make that motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is one motion all that is allowed under the rule?

The SPEAKER. Only one motion is allowed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is that not subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, whether the gentleman from New York could not move his amendment as a substitute for mine?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. KASSON. There is but one motion in order under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very glad if gentlemen could arrange the matter between themselves. The Chair, however, has no discretion, having recognized the gentleman from Texas to make the motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Would it not be in order to offer a substitute for his motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it not be in order to amend the instruction?

The SPEAKER. It would not. This is a motion pending the demand for the previous question, or it may be made after the previous question is ordered. But the gentleman from Texas prefers to make the motion pending the demand for the previous question; and the Chair holds that it is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that we may have a vote at this time upon the question submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Several members objected.

Mr. SPRINGER. Why do gentlemen object?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Illinois objected to forwarding the business by one stage——

Mr. SPRINGER. That was a substantial objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McLANE. One moment. I ask unanimous consent of the House——

Mr. CAMP. I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this is an objection on principle.

Mr. McLANE. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House to have read for information the proposed instructions of the gentleman from New York, in order that we may know their purport.

Mr. MILLS. My instructions are those which were proposed by Robert J. Walker in the tariff of 1846.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill creating a tariff commission be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report within thirty days a bill framed in compliance with the following instructions:

1. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered.

2. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate that will yield the largest amount of revenue.

3. That below such rate discrimination may be made descending in the scale of duties, or for imperative reasons the article may be placed on the list of those free from all duty.

4. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

5. That all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

6. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Does the Chair hold that this is not subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. MILLS. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 75, nays 152, not voting 64; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.
The SPEAKER. The question recurs on ordering the previous question.
Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I would like to ask unanimous consent, before the previous question is ordered, to have the resolution I proposed to offer read, and, unless objected to, to have a vote upon it.
Mr. BAYNE. I object.
Mr. KASSON. It has already been read.
Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Does the gentleman object to the resolution being printed in the RECORD? I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.
Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to that.
Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let it be read.
Several MEMBERS. No, No.
There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report as soon as possible a bill providing for a reduction in the revenue from imposts and internal duties, so that the amount of such taxes shall not exceed the annual expenditures for carrying on the Government, the payment of interest on the public debt, the contribution to the sinking fund when required, and the pension-rolls; and that in making such reduction no duty shall be imposed on imported articles, except luxuries, exceeding 50 per cent. of their dutiable value; and that domestic tobacco and alcohol used in manufacture shall be relieved from internal-revenue duties.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand a second upon ordering the previous question.
The SPEAKER. There is no rule which provides for that. The previous question may be ordered by a majority of members present.
The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were—ayes 116, noes 9.
Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum.
The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. KASSON, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER.
Mr. SPRINGER. All I want is a vote on the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] [Cries of "regular order."] If the gentleman will allow that vote to be taken I will not insist upon the point as to a quorum. [Cries of "regular order."]
The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 143, noes 8.
So the previous question was ordered.
Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Clerk will report the first amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of section 3 the words "and the existing system of internal-revenue laws."

The question was taken upon agreeing to the amendment, and upon a division there were—ayes 107, noes 29.
So (no further count being called for) the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.
The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was, to strike out section 4 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the commission shall report to Congress the results of their investigation, and the testimony taken in the course of the same, from time to time, and make their final report not later than the first Monday in January, 1883.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 4. That the commission shall make to Congress a final report of the results of its investigation, and the testimony taken in the course of the same, not later than the first Monday of December, 1882; and it shall cause the testimony taken to be printed from time to time and distributed to members of Congress by the Public Printer, and shall also cause to be printed for the use of Congress 2,000 copies of its final report, together with the testimony.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.
The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time.
The question was upon the passage of the bill.
Mr. KASSON. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.
The previous question was ordered.
Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.
Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the day I shall be as brief as possible in concluding the debate [cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] and come as promptly as possible to the consideration of the question.
Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. You are going to pass the bill.
Mr. KASSON. I think so myself, but I should like to give one or two reasons that will get your vote, my friend, and others on your side of the House for the bill.
There has been much said touching the character and the object of the bill, and particularly that it was a bill to delay the revision of the tariff; and that the Committee on Ways and Means should at once proceed with the entire work. To that first point I beg the attention of the House for a few moments.
This bill has been pressed from its first introduction with all the force that could be commanded in the attitude which the opponents of the bill presented. And it would have been a law before this time but for the opposition of those who are clamoring for a reform of the tariff.
I am one of those who earnestly believe that this bill will sooner more completely and more perfectly accomplish a revision and reform of the tariff than any bill for its revision which could now be reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. We have had so much experience upon this subject that I am justified in the statement that any bill for a revision of the tariff, if now pending before this House, could not possibly pass at this session of Congress. We have had continually complaints made of various features of the tariff which demand correction. But when bills have before been brought in from the Committee on Ways and Means, and an earnest effort has been made to pass them through the House, we have at all periods during the last six years met the same difficulty which we have encountered now, namely, that the imperfectness of the information possessed by members has induced them to indulge in wild debate, and to object alternately to every proposition, disputing facts, and lacking the light which a full knowledge of the facts would give them.
Mr. ATKINS. Would it be an accommodation to the gentleman to move that the House now adjourn and allow him to conclude his speech on Tuesday next?
Mr. KASSON. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, but I feel it my duty to let the House come to a vote now. I therefore must decline his proposition with thanks. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" from the Democratic side.] I have something to say to some of you gentlemen. [Renewed cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]
Mr. COX, of New York. I hope that the gentleman will be allowed to go on with his remarks.
Mr. HAZELTON. I hope gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber will listen candidly to the gentleman's speech.
Mr. KASSON. It has been said that the proposition here made for the appointment of a civil commission was one designed for delay, and that has been said in the face of the whole history of the past six years. Repeatedly has the effort been made for a revision of the tariff, and I can sum up the result by quoting the declaration of a former chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who said that he found that the bill under his charge "had been nibbled to death by pismires and kicked to death by grasshoppers." And my friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] will recollect the occasion which brought forth that declaration from the chairman.
If you have a doubt about it, let me call your attention to the difference of opinion upon points of fact that has been developed in this debate. No three men of opposite sides of the House have agreed upon the facts which should lie at the foundation of any proper revision of the tariff. Upon the simple subject of anthracite coal there has been a positive affirmation by a gentleman on the one side and a positive denial by a gentleman on the other side. Take the cost of Bessemer steel and the amount of profits derived from its manufacture. There is absolute discordance of opinion and of declarations on the two sides of the House. Take the requisite duty which is necessary to protect American labor against foreign labor. There has been absolute difference of affirmations on both sides of the House. Take any question, and from the very beginning of the debate to this moment there has not been identity of opinion touching any of the facts that constitute the necessary basis for a correct revision of the tariff.
Is it strange, then, that we endeavor to form a commission which shall report the facts to us as accurately as human judgment will enable them to present them as a guide for our action? Is it to be hoped that under the present contradictory circumstances a simple report from the Committee on Ways and Means will bring about an identity of opinion in the House on points of fact?
Hence I have earnestly insisted that there should be a commission of civilians to investigate and report the facts to us, because here in the House we have such fixed opinions and theories that not one mind out of ten is at liberty to investigate for the truth alone, irrespective of the bearing of the facts upon his own preconceived opinion and prejudice.

Let any leading man on this floor go to the examination of witnesses, with all his prejudices touching the proper principles and rates of a tariff, and his natural course is to seek for that kind of information which will support his own opinions. He questions as an advocate to support his own side of the case, devoid of judicial impartiality.

The only hope that exists in my mind of a correct, scientific, and just revision of the tariff is in finding men to serve on this commission who are not politicians, who will seek and report the actual condition of the great industries of the country, their exposure to competition with foreign industries, and what they need to put them upon a level with foreign competitors in getting their products upon the market. It is precisely for this reason that such a commission is necessary; composed of men who understand the elements of national prosperity, who seek no political ends, and who will inquire with business intelligence and report with conscientious accuracy.

[Mr. SPRINGER rose.] I decline to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I only wish to say——

Mr. KASSON. Will not the gentleman recognize a distinct declination?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly; go on.

Mr. KASSON. Before I get through I will endeavor to give attention to some positions the gentleman has taken, and if necessary for a settlement of the matter will yield to him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is because of my conviction that the tariff needs reform, that the free list needs to be increased, that certain great products of the country need a special and careful protection to put them on a level with foreign production, and because I want facts without the color of politics in them that I have been an earnest advocate of this commission from the time the proposition was first made in either branch of Congress. In view of the results to be obtained, even if this examination should take two years, we ought willingly to give those two years to get at a solid basis for a permanent tariff.

Our industries are prejudiced, our investors are hesitating for fear of the action of Congress when Congress does not consult the business interests of the country, but threatens a guerrilla warfare all along the line, on the principle, "when you see a head, hit it." A reckless change in one link of the chain of connected industries intercepts the whole line of prosperity and may precipitate disaster and panic. We have no right to strike such blows without notice to enterprises which have grown up under the encouragement of our existing laws.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and other gentlemen have ridiculed the Ways and Means Committee because that committee, with its partial light, has not come in promptly with a bill for the entire revision of the tariff. To me it is a new theory that the Congress of the United States knows more than all the people of the United States. To me it is a new proposition that a man elected to Congress becomes thereby so great and so omniscient that he can learn nothing from the people who stand behind him. I have served many years on the Ways and Means Committee, the oldest in priority of service of its present members; and never did we listen to evidence submitted to us by practical men without finding new light important to our conclusions, and teaching us that behind the witness were other witnesses whom we ought to hear and could consult to our profit.

How is it, Mr. Speaker, that when a man, coming from the people as a Representative, stands in that area and takes the oath which you administer to him, some political transubstantiation takes place, some divine consecration and afflatus which lets into his darkened soul, as one of the people, the genius of knowledge, the genius of truth, and the genius of wisdom? Did the gentleman from Illinois, who ridiculed this proposition, feel, when he stood there, the incoming of the heavenly light? If he did, sir, the gift to communicate it to the House was not imparted to him at the same time. [Laughter.]

No, sir; this country is vaster than any man in this House. The interests of this country are beyond the grasp of any man on this floor. Take one single industry, and where will you find three men who can trace it from the coal, or the raw material, through its machinery to its final product put upon the market? Where is the man in this House who can thus trace the silk thread, or even the cotton thread, and tell you how much labor there is in it, and how much that labor needs to protect it against the cheaper labor of the Old World? Who can rise in his place and tell you what it costs abroad to produce it, what it costs at home to produce it, and what rate is adequate to the maintenance of our home competition with the foreign article?

We know that we do not know the facts which are known by the practical operators of the industries of the country; and it is the arrant nonsense of a vain imagination or a conceited mind that attempts to declare itself able unassisted to revise the tariff on between two and three thousand articles in such a way as will best promote the highest interests of the country. [Applause.] If this is so, then this measure is due to our enterprising and laborious people. The people have demanded it by petitions signed by unnumbered thousands. Organizations of labor have demanded it; representatives of agricultural industry have demanded it; and the very men who adhere to the theories of those who oppose this commission have given special reasons for it.

I will ask the Clerk to read from the declaration of a gentleman in New York, who is an advocate of the proposition made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] I ask to have read from the remarks of D. C. Robbins, of New York, what he says in regard to past experiences in endeavors to reform the tariff by a committee of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Should a commission meet to consider the claims of rival industries, without regard to any basis of action, we shall have revived the old and long continued scramble for favor at the hands of Congress; and we should probably obtain a conglomerate bill in repetition of the errors committed by the late Hon. Mr. Wood, when chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, as well as by Mr. MORRISON, his predecessor. The Hon. Mr. Wood was impressed with the idea that the simplifying of the customs list was all that was required; and he did it, by placing manufactured articles in great variety on the free list, while he placed raw materials, because fewer in number, on the taxable list, and so reintroduced to the taxable from the free list at least one-third of all the grain made in 1870 under the supervision of Mr. David A. Wells. Mr. MORRISON, his predecessor, conceived a similar idea, and placed on the free list a long line of manufactures, upon which the Government derived but a small income, and stumbled practically into more errors than Mr. Wood. Most surely we have had enough of this ignorant tinkering with the tariff.

Mr. KASSON. That is a business man's view of the boasted capacity of your Ways and Means Committee to frame tariff bills out of their inner consciousness. He proceeds to say:

England had the sagacity to see that a nation with access to and choice of all markets can generally afford to make her own market an open market in return; while a nation with less commercial facilities, which is our own situation at present, with no important market for manufacturers but the home market, must insure this market to her manufacturers, or they will be driven to the wall, at a more or less remote period, by excess of production elsewhere, if not by immediate competition.

Although this gentleman says, "I believe in the nearest approach to free trade possible," he has the candor further on to say:

We cannot afford to dispense with protection, however distasteful this may be to the theorist or sentimental philosopher; because the wealth of a nation consists as much in the skill of her workmen as in the education of the masses. We cannot dispense with skillful industries, as skillful industries increase national wealth, &c.

There is the declaration of a commercial representative in this direct connection recently made at a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of New York City. "Although," he says, "I believe in the nearest approach to free trade possible," he immediately adds, "I look upon protective duties as exceptional, but necessary, not to be dispensed with so long as the manufacturer is for any reason not on a level with his foreign competitor."

So you find it admitted in commercial circles, as you do in nearly every branch of business in this country, with every intelligent man of business, that the principle of protection must be observed. And I repeat, as I stated in my opening, the whole point is involved in this: if you are for free trade, vote against this inquiry by the commission; if you are "for revenue only," vote against this inquiry, because we can find the necessary facts on file as statistics in the Treasury Department, showing what revenue the articles will yield at a certain rate of duty. If, on the contrary, you believe that protection is necessary to any extent, incidental or absolute, you want the information to be obtained through this commission in order to know how to fix your duty with reference to the competitive character of the industry in relation to the articles we import. There is no escape from that conclusion.

But the free-trader has a way of his own. He insists that pure reason determines this whole question of political economy. You are to learn it from books. If facts stand in his way he denies the facts. Anything in the way of pure reason must give way to pure reason. That is the whole doctrine of free trade. Others of us——

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman is misunderstood.

Mr. KASSON. Excuse me, if you please. Others of us appeal to facts, believing proper economic principles are obtained by the inductive method. We reason from facts and their results to our principles. [Mr. COX, of New York, rose.] Excuse me. Free-traders believe——

Mr. COX, of New York. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that he is misunderstood on this side of the House.

Mr. KASSON. Excuse me. I really wish the gentleman from New York to excuse me. I desire to be courteous, but I beg the gentleman to excuse me.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from New York has stated that you are misunderstood on this side of the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. He advises us how to vote. The gentleman said those in favor of protection would vote for this inquiry, did you not?

Mr. KASSON. Then you will not excuse me?

Mr. COX, of New York. I am intervening for your comfort, and beg you will make yourself more explicit.

Mr. KASSON. I will do it in a moment.

Mr. COX, of New York. Did you not say those in favor of protection to any extent should vote for this inquiry?

Mr. KASSON. Yes; they will vote for this inquiry to learn all the facts, so that equal justice may be done to all interests.

Mr. COX, of New York. And that those who are for revenue only will vote the other way?

Mr. KASSON. Yes; that those who are "for revenue only" have no occasion to vote for it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am glad you draw the line so distinctly.

Mr. KASSON. I do draw it, and I draw it with distinctness.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right.

Mr. COX, of New York. Much obliged to you for your speech.

Mr. KASSON. Yes, Mr. Speaker; the free-trader reasons somewhat this way, and I wish to say in passing that the difference between men "for revenue only" and free-traders, or that difference which seems to exist, is really a distinction without a difference. When this question was up some years ago, the logical free-trade men went directly as a legitimate result to the abolition of all the custom-houses because they were a restriction on trade, which was against the correct principles of political economy. Direct taxation was the only just taxation, to be applied equally to all values irrespective of domestic or foreign origin.

Now, sir, the reasoning of the free-trader is peculiar. He insists that correct political economy requires free trade in order to national prosperity; and that a high tariff is inconsistent with prosperity. We point to the facts. Our facts are distorted because hostile to their theory. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] said: "As a general rule people cannot afford to sell where they are not permitted to buy what they need with the proceeds of their sale." That means that we cannot sell to Europe because we cannot buy with proceeds of sale in return under our tariff. We point to the facts. We admit that we have as against most European goods a high duty—some of them call it prohibitory—a fact which by the laws of free trade should prohibit us from selling to Europe. The theory of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] says: "No; that cannot be so, because one of the fundamental principles of free-trade philosophy is that you must buy or you cannot sell."

Well, sir, I turn to the last annual report of the Bureau of Statistics, and I find on the first page the magnificent result for 1881 of a trade of $1,675,000,000 "larger than during any previous year in the history of the country." I look to the total exports and find them nine hundred and two millions, declared to be "larger than during any previous year;" imports, six hundred and forty-two millions, "larger than the value of such imports during any preceding year" except 1880. I find trade goes on under this high tariff with unprecedented prosperity, utterly dwarfing all results ever obtained under the revenue tariffs of 1846 and 1857—the most dogmatic theories of free trade to the contrary notwithstanding.

The gentleman from Kentucky also contested my argument touching the beneficial effect of protection in increasing home consumption of the products of agriculture. My argument was that a prosperous laboring class whose industries are sustained by a proper protection consumes more of the cereal products of the country than they otherwise would; that diversity of industries is always a benefit to agriculture. Against that he says—I have not his speech before me, but will quote it—that a far greater percentage was exported——

Mr. CARLISLE. A greater percentage of the total amount of production.

Mr. KASSON. Yes, a greater percentage of the total amount of production was exported under the present tariff system than in the last free-trade year, 1859. Well, I ventured to interrupt him, and this colloquy appears in his speech:

> Mr. CARLISLE. The exports of Indian corn in 1860 amounted to less than one-half of 1 per cent. of the product, but in 1880 they amounted to 6.34 per cent., while the exports of wheat in 1860 amounted to 2.40 per cent., and in 1880 to 34¼ per cent. of the entire product.
> Mr. KASSON. I would like, if the gentleman would allow me, to ask him in this connection if the proper way to test the consumption is not to make the calculation on a per capita basis and not the amount exported. And also I would ask the gentleman if he has taken into consideration the increased production of our cereals by reason of the development of agricultural machinery since 1860, which developed agriculture in the West enormously and produced the surplus?
>
> Mr. CARLISLE. In response to the gentleman from Iowa, I will state that I am now simply dealing with an argument which asserts that the protective system itself has created a home market for a larger proportion of our agricultural products than existed before; and I am showing by the statistics that in fact a much larger percentage of such products is now compelled to go abroad for a market than in 1850 or 1860, when we had a revenue-tariff system.
> Mr. KASSON. But does that meet the argument unless you take notice of the great increase from the source which I have stated and the surplus arising from the introduction of improved machinery, a surplus which could not be consumed at home or disposed of abroad?

I have sent to the Bureau of Statistics for information, whose answer I have here in my hand, and I find my statement verified by the facts.

I find in 1850 (i.e., for the year 1849) the percentage of the total product of wheat exported was only seventy-seven hundredths of 1 per cent.; in 1860, (for the year 1859,) as the gentleman has stated, it was 2.40 per cent., and in 1881 it was 30.22 per cent., which was a most gratifying feature of our trade that year. But when you look at the home consumption, per capita, in the same official tables you find in 1850 only 4.35 bushels consumed per capita; in 1860, 5.37 bushels; while in 1881, under the protective tariff, it was 6.76 bushels in consumption per capita in this country. These figures sustain precisely my declaration that the farmer's best interests demand protected labor and prosperous employment, which enables the farmer to sell his products as far as possible at home and save the cost of exportation abroad. That is the statement for wheat. Now, as to Indian corn I find a similar result. In 1860 it was forty-hundredths of 1 per cent. exported, while in 1881 it rose to 5¼ per cent. of an enormously increased crop. The consumption per capita in 1860 was 26.57 bushels, and in 1881 31.59 bushels. So I find that if my honored friend from Kentucky——

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me there to ask if it is not a fact that the consumption per capita includes as well that portion of the grain which is used for seed purposes? It is not confined alone to what they consume, but to what is used in other necessary ways as well.

Mr. KASSON. I took the same data for both periods, so that the comparison is absolutely perfect. The data are the same from which the gentleman drew his own conclusions, though he omitted the data for consumption. All the facts are certified from the Bureau of Statistics. So I find the proposition absolutely sustained, that the consumption per capita was notably greater in times of prosperity secured by protection than at a time when a mere revenue tariff was in operation.

In further reply to the gentleman I read the following from the annual statistical report of 1881:

> The value of the products of agriculture exported from the United States during the years 1830, 1840, 1850, 1860, 1870, and 1881, respectively, showed a fluctuation of only about 3 per cent. of the total value of exports of domestic merchandise. This indicates that the growth of the exportation of commodities other than products of agriculture, chiefly products of manufacture, kept pace with the astonishing growth of the exportation of the products of agriculture.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, go over the argument so ably presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] as to the condition of our industries during the period which the gentleman from Kentucky characterized as the "golden era." I have here in this old book, published in 1850, the testimony as to the exact condition of things at that time, as shown by a meeting of the iron interests of the country, in the presence of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] he being a member of the convention, of its committee on resolutions, and protesting against that condition as one of ruin, and demanding relief by an increase of the tariff.

But referring to that gentleman, sir, reminds me that in the opening of his elaborate speech, where he, like the gentleman from Kentucky, denied many of the arguments if not the fundamental propositions of my opening speech on this subject, he made a very proper and legitimate attack upon me by citing from a speech of 1866, in which I used language from which he quoted partial extracts. But I used it with reference to rates of tariff, believing them extravagantly high at the time, while that gentleman would imply that I used it in favor of the doctrine of free trade, although, in the same speech, I declared myself in favor of protection where it was needed.

Having myself always recognized the fundamental principles of protection, I have not been able to see absolute benefit to the manufactures of the country from an extravagantly high tariff, promoting excessive and ruinous competition in our home markets.

Inasmuch, however, as the gentleman from New York had made this attack upon my consistency I naturally supposed his own record must be consistent and free from the shadow of mutation. Judge of my surprise when I traced him by speeches and letters and resolutions all the way up from 1848, when he bolted the Democratic ticket and supported Taylor to get a protective tariff, and found him an ardent advocate of protection until very recently. And even so late as 1870 he insisted that steel rails should be protected at the then existing rate of tariff. And so on throughout his record until a recent period he has been a more earnest advocate of protection than I myself have been.

In 1848, at Trenton, during the Taylor campaign, he delivered an address which was published in the State Gazette of that city, and offered certain resolutions to the meeting, also published there, and which I find reproduced in the New York Tribune of October 25, 1880. In the address he says:

> Protection to American manufactures is nothing but protection to labor and laborers. The value of every manufacture is made up entirely of the wages paid to produce it. Coal and iron in the mines cost nothing, &c. * * * Mr. HEWITT continued that he was not a Whig, but a Democrat; still he went for protection now, and should support General Taylor because he would sign a bill to protect American labor, &c.

The resolutions which he offered elaborate his argument, that both the laborer and the farmer needed a protective tariff, even in the "golden era" of the Walker revenue system. I quote only one of these resolutions, as follows:

> That hence arises the necessity for a tariff, which properly devised is merely a system whereby the price of labor, which naturally results under a free and economical government, is prevented from being reduced to the pauper level of labor which just as naturally results under governments when the first fruits of labor, instead of being secured to the hand that earns them, are filched away in order to maintain the costly splendor of thrones and the idle extravagance of an enervated aristocracy.

The whole record may be found in the speech of my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. BREWER,] in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 9, 1882.

I take the following extracts from an original edition of the proceedings of the Trenton iron convention of December, 1849.

The committee on resolutions, of which the gentleman from New York was a member, reported fifteen resolutions. Touching the "golden era" of the Robert J. Walker tariff of 1846, so much boasted by the gentleman from Kentucky and others, I quote from the fifth resolution as follows:

That the business is now prostrated and widespread ruin threatened because they are exposed to them, and that an efficient remedy is only to be found in the action of the General Government.

Here is what he and his convention thought then of my argument that prosperous home manufactures also benefit agriculture:

11. Resolved, That the employment of labor in manufactures, by diverting a large amount from agriculture, insures a home market and better prices to the farmer.

And in his thirteenth resolution, which I give entire:

13. Resolved, therefore, That the protection which this convention desires is protection for the Government against frauds upon the revenue; for the importer against dishonest competition; for the producer against the unnatural fluctuations of trade; for the consumer against high prices of iron, which are rendered inevitable by the absence of domestic production; for the laborer against the meager rewards which a narrow field for employment must occasion; and for the farmer and planter against the obvious disadvantages of a single market and the loss of intrinsic value entailed upon his produce by the expense of transporting it abroad.

These are to be added to the resolutions at Trenton in 1848 which the gentleman probably remembers. I will now ask the Clerk to read from this book which I hold in my hand, published in 1850, the marked clause on the subject of wages, to which I call the attention of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, then, if we must make iron in this country in competition with English labor it is very clear what must be done. The laborer must take less wages. In other words, he must not think of a savings fund. Then, like the English operative, he must eat less meat and use inferior food. And then his wife must dispense with all the little comforts that make home home; and then his children must be imprisoned in the cotton-factory as soon as they can walk instead of going to school; and he must finally become almost as soulless as the machinery he guides. But the laborer protests against such degradation, and the farmer against any diminution in the consumption of his products; and humanity protests against the whole scheme as a step backward, and as shocking to the Christian spirit of the age.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Who is the author of that?

Mr. KASSON. The letter is signed "Cooper and Hewitt." It is a letter first appearing in the Journal of Commerce in the same "golden era" of the Robert J. Walker tariff of 1846 which they now want to restore on that side of the House, and was written in condemnation of the effect of that tariff on the great interests he at that time represented. I shall soon show the same positions held by him as late as 1870. In his speech the other day, nevertheless, he rushes wildly against his own long record, and says:

But the truth is that the tariff has nothing to do with the matter.

That is, with laborers' wages.

I will not say "nothing to do;" it has an influence for evil, but it has no influence for good; it cannot create good times; it cannot create high wages; it cannot give employment except in one single contingency, to which I shall recur hereafter; and in that contingency it was powerless from 1875 to 1878 inclusive.

* * * * * * *

Now, then, I take my first proposition, directly antagonizing the gentleman from Iowa. I assert that legislation cannot create value nor can it determine the rate of wages. The issue is fairly made up.

* * * * * * *

I feel it necessary to make this statement, because many persons who have not given much reflection to this subject seem to think that there is some potency in legislation which can add value to the forces of nature.

But, sir, the gentleman from New York seems to regard facts very much as the artist regards the plastic clay, a substance to be molded into any form that his fancy dictates, and that fancy changing from moment to moment even during the speech which he delivered, for he says in another part of the same speech, referring to the duties imposed by the early Congresses of this country:

The duty imposed—

I quote from the gentleman's speech—

added to the price of the article, and hence as this article was raised artificially in price, labor directed to its production would be better rewarded than labor devoted to the production of the untaxed articles.

And still, in the same paragraph of the speech, in direct antagonism to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, and denying that legislation could have any effect upon wages unless it be injurious, he says again:

Assuming always that the labor and capital in each case were not misapplied in such cases the revenue duty necessarily becomes protective, the labor devoted to the production of the protected article being thus better paid.

Not yet content with this logical swamp in which he plunges us, he adds this heading to the next paragraph:

Wages fixed by free trade and not by protection.

And puts it in capital letters.

Thus you see the inconsistencies in the speech itself. And I have other conflicts noted here which I have not time further to allude to, in which, according as his fancy is directed toward one result or another, all facts become plastic clay in his hand, and the result is to be declared in accordance with the pet theory he for the moment supports. I have here his report to the Secretary of State in 1867 as a commissioner to the international exposition at Paris, his report on iron and steel; and the burden of that report is that our laborers being better paid than in Europe we cannot compete with the labor of Europe without protection. In one of his former productions, which I have read, I think he puts the ratio at that time at four to one; that is, the rate of wages paid to our people as compared with the wages paid in Europe.

In his official report of 1867 (pages 46, 47) he speaks of—

The unpaid, unfed, and unhappy operatives throughout all lands in which human industry is now weighed down by the effects of British competition based upon superior natural resources.

After much writing upon the cheap labor of England, he says that we can either throw open our ports to foreign iron or—

We can impose such a duty on foreign iron as will make up for the differences in the amount of wages paid for making a ton of iron in Europe or in this country, less the expense of transportation.

The decision of this question is mainly of interest to the working classes themselves, and to the great body of farmers, &c.

I now come down to 1870, and to the subject of steel rails. Mr. Jay Gould, in a letter addressed to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] under date of January 26, 1870, asked his opinion, first giving his own, as follows:

It seemed to me that our policy should be to foster and encourage home products rather than open our markets to such a formidable competition as would inevitably result from the reduction so strongly urged in the memorial. By establishing extensively the manufacture of steel rails on our own soil and protecting their production by a tariff which would effectually prevent the importation of European rails to any great extent, we could, in my opinion, be largely the gainers in the long run, for the capital invested would all be kept in the country. Our operatives would find constant and lucrative employment, and the general effect upon our business could not fail to be beneficial. I am at a loss to perceive why we should contribute so large an amount annually to build up the trade and manufactures of foreign countries while our own interests are sacrificed by just so much.

Here is the reply:

NEW YORK, January 27, 1870.

DEAR SIR: I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 26th instant, and to state that I not only fully concur in the views which you express in regard to the duties on steel and iron rails but am at a loss to add anything which will make them more forcible. And I venture to suggest that you will allow me to send a copy of your letter to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The fact is that steel and iron rails can be made in suitable localities in this country, and notably on the line of the Erie Railway, with as little labor as in any part of the world; and the only reason why we pay more for American rails is because we pay a higher rate for the labor which is required for their manufacture, but for no greater quantity of labor. Free trade will simply reduce the wages of labor to the foreign standard, which will enable us to sell our rails in competition with foreign rails. But as a matter of course the ability of the laborer to consume will be reduced and a serious loss will be inflicted on commerce, general industry, and the business of the railways especially.

The only reason why a tariff is necessary is to supply the laborer with such wages as will enable him to travel and consume not merely the necessaries but some of the luxuries of modern civilization.

Besides, if we have free trade we cannot expect to procure our supplies from abroad by increased shipments of grain; for already the European markets take from us all that they require, and no amount of purchase of goods from them will induce them to buy more food than they need, and which they now take as a matter of necessity.

Faithfully, yours,

ABRAM S. HEWITT.

JAY GOULD, Esq., President Erie Railway.

It was then thought by two eminent business men that the tariff legislation had something to do with wages.

But that is not all. Later still than his printed speech, in speaking yesterday of the question of steel rails and the profits of a company known as the Pennsylvania Steel Company, when my honored friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, denied that any such dividend had been made by Bessemer steel works as alleged, the gentleman from New York shouted with dramatic action to the House, "I have got the proof here," and when at last the House was quieted and listened to it, what did they hear? He read an item cut out of a newspaper, headed "An award to J. Edgar Thompson's widow:"

Judge Ashman yesterday filed an adjudication in the estate of J. Edgar Thompson, formerly president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The question was whether about fifty thousand dollars' worth of stock of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, which had recently been obtained by the estate, should be regarded as part of the capital of the estate or as a dividend given to Mrs. Thompson absolutely. Judge Ashman took the latter view, and awarded the property to the widow.

Then he went on to speak of a 50 per cent. dividend. No such dividend appears in this article at all. It was a simple award of a property that had been acquired in some way by the estate of Thompson. And thus we find the gentleman from New York molding, with that thing in his hand, a newspaper slip into "evidence" that there had been a 50 per cent. dividend at the steel works without any statement of the amount of capital stock, or the evidence that even a dividend had ever been declared by the steel works. Not content with that, a gentleman who understood the condition of facts to be different, telegraphed, and received this reply, that it was—

A distribution of stock, but not a dividend; a privilege of stockholders, of which Thompson's estate was one, to subscribe for a certain percentage of their stock holdings at par, which stock was purchased from large stockholders at a premium.

Thus there appears no annual dividend of profits at all in it. It was stock purchased by the estate and awarded to the widow as of her right, presumably under the provisions of some will. Now, sir, when such gentlemen claim that they can revise the tariff "in thirty days," and when they have no more respect for facts than to assert deliberately in this House, without a scintilla of proof, a given instance of large yearly profits, the people of this country are justified in asking us to go out of this House and find some other means for ascertaining and reporting the facts as they are. [Applause.]

Still the gentleman from New York went on with his argument in favor of free trade in a large class of articles which agriculture produces, but not free trade in manufactures of foreign countries, and so I find him using all through his speech conflicting arguments. But I find in the main that wherever he touches the question of a revenue tariff or of free trade he takes the views sustained by the arguments of the English free-traders.

I ventured to remind him, at the time he was making his speech, of an opinion which I read in my opening, of an eminent and very aged citizen of New York, without calling attention to the relationship that existed between him and that citizen, Mr. Peter Cooper. I referred to that as the evidence of a man ninety years of age, who had passed through all the tariffs of the country, who had seen their effects on the industries of the country and who firmly adhered to the protective principle. I referred to his opinion as one that would weigh with me, who am not his son-in-law, irrespective of any personal relationship. The gentleman from New York supposed naturally (and it was in my mind as an added point that he was closely related) that I desired to call attention to that relationship. And he made a reply to me which he said he quoted from one of his own speeches made at a dinner-table; that he hoped the day would some time come when Mr. Peter Cooper would be referred to as the father-in-law of Mr. HEWITT, instead of the latter as son-in-law to the former.

I gave him credit for a witty remark, supposing that that at least was an American product; but a little later I opened a book connected with the life of Prince Talleyrand, and I found there that a certain M. de St. Aulaire and a certain Duc de Cazes stood in the relation of father-in-law and son-in-law and that they had such different qualities as to lead Talleyrand to make a bon mot on the subject. He said that M. de St. Aulaire was formerly spoken of as the father-in-law of Duc de Cazes; but now the Duc was spoken of as the son-in-law of M. de St. Aulaire. Well, sir, if the gentleman from New York must import his arguments on political economy from England and his wit from France, he must be an out-and-out free-trader. [Great laughter.]

I have not time to go over all the very serious arguments which have been presented and which have been so thoroughly canvassed on this floor. After listening to the entire arguments on both sides of the House upon this subject so far as practicable, I come back to my propositions. The reduction of prices in this country has not been necessarily produced, and always, in the first stage, by the establishment of a protective tariff. But through the second degree the protective tariff creating the industries of the country, protecting them, fostering them, until the competition of our home manufactures grows important and becomes better than any foreign competition, and is added to the foreign, as a result of this increased competition prices have continually fallen in this country to the benefit of the consumer.

I have a table here which I shall print in part, furnished to me by an aged man, nearly eighty years old, who lives in New York and who remembers the tariff of 1816. He gives the prices in New York of farm products at the time of the introduction of our protective tariffs, when as yet there was no great Northwest, and compares those prices with the prices now. He also gives the prices of manufactured goods at that time, and compares them with the prices now. (See appendix C.)

Summing it all up, while manufactures under the influence of our protective and fostering care have continually fallen in prices, have enormously fallen, the fall varying from 250 to 400 per cent., the products of the farm have steadily advanced in price to a degree of from 300 to 400 per cent. in this lapse of years, making an aggregate difference to the profit of the farmer from the change that has been effected in the life-time of this one man of from 550 to 800 per cent. Of course, inventions of machinery and other improved arts have had much to do with this decrease of price; but even these are largely due to the fostering of industries by legislation, industries to which they could be applied.

Thus it cannot fail to be observed by any test that you can apply to it that a protective tariff does, logically and historically, have the effect to reduce the prices of manufactured articles continually from year to year. It produces the great domestic competition; first, studying the wants of the market; second, with less cost of transportation, being nearer home; and third, the great increase in domestic capital reducing rates of interest, lightening rates of taxation, seeking investment everywhere, and always developing new sources of national prosperity and new diversities of industry.

Now, if your legislation tends to break down these industries, if you do not inquire so as to be sure that they can be maintained, if you deal recklessly with them, you will destroy home competition, substitute for it foreign competition alone, with the added cost of transportation both ways, and with all the embarrassments of a distant market you diminish home consumption and send our wealth abroad to enrich foreign lands at the expense of your own. Agriculture will then, as in the past, bear its large share of the distress which comes with financial panics and prostrated industries.

I say this not because I am for one interest of the country alone; I am for all its interests. I want to sustain agriculture with all the power that my information in connection with legislation can give me. I want to sustain manufactures to the point where there is such reasonable profit made that they are encouraged and can be maintained here in our midst, among our people and at their doors. And I will sustain every other industry as far as my ability goes. I wish to aid our diversified industries more than I ever did before, for my State has under its soil coal beds inexhaustible. I have seen farmers suddenly become rich by the discovery of coal mines on their farms. And they know, against all your doctrines of free trade, that if you break down manufacturing industries you will break down railroad construction and transportation, break down other enterprises, and will destroy largely the value of this inestimable gift of Divine Providence which underlies the rich soil of Iowa.

We must bear all these interests in mind; they are entitled to protection. And when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and others say there is no power under the Constitution to impose a duty for anything but revenue, not even to secure incidental protection, except what inevitably results from such duties, as was said by the gentlemen from Kentucky, I have but to point those gentlemen to the act of Congress of 1789 drawn by Hamilton and signed by Washington, the first act upon this subject, which in its first section declared "the encouragement and protection of manufactures" to be "necessary." Did not the framers of the Constitution, two years after its signature, know its meaning? From that day to this the doctrine has been maintained. From that day to this there has been a great party, and usually a triumphant party, maintaining the doctrine of protection to all the great interests of the United States.

Do you desire an ocean to lie forever between you and your supplies? Do you believe the Christian millennium has come, and that there never will be war to interrupt our commerce with Europe? You dare not allow your country, in those interests which are indispensable to her independence, to fall into dependence upon foreign countries. To-day the weakness of England lies in the fact that the bread necessary to feed her people must come across seas, and in case of naval war the interruption of her communications would bring starvation to her people. Once already it has withheld her from entering into war with Russia. She is chained in her international action by her dependence upon the Mediterranean and this shore of the Atlantic for her supplies of food. At the outbreak of our recent war we were dependent upon foreign supplies for clothing for our Army, but at that time our ships could still bring it to us until our mills got to work under new impulses and furnished the material for clothing our Army.

No, gentlemen, it concerns the independence of your country, it concerns the independence of North and South alike in the future, to have all the necessaries of life, manufactures as well as food products, produced in our midst and within reach of our hand. We are approaching that national condition in all parts of the United States. I have here the speech made at the Atlanta exhibition by the president of the National Cotton Planters' Association. It shows how the tide of prosperity which has been flowing over this country within the last few years has reanimated the South.

I quote briefly from his address:

> Yes, throughout all this fair domain, from east to west, the clarion promise of hope for the future has sounded the death-knell to bygones, and though the last census told for us a not unflattering tale, the next one will astonish the world. Our mines, forests, and streams, and other natural factors of wealth, cry out and demand that they shall take part in this marvelous race of civilization by which we are surrounded, and receive their just recognition from the capital of the world, and it is a matter of fact they do not cry in vain.
>
> We have only to look, my friends, at our surroundings, and reflect that 4,000 miles of new railways have been built this year in the South, and nearly entirely in the cotton States, adding, at a cost of $30,000 per mile, $120,000,000 to our wealth, and giving us, for our next census report with the same rate of increase over one billion and a half dollars of wealth and as many miles of railroads as the entire Union contained in 1865 over and above and without counting the now existing lines.

> The building of our great railway system is not the only evidence of our progress, for in all the cotton States cotton-mills and manufacturing enterprises of many kinds are being started, while in some of them the most gigantic mining operations are being undertaken.

There is a reinvigoration and reanimation of all the South and the West under the influence of protected industries such as has never before been seen. There is indeed a "new South;" and this is but one of the clarion notes of triumph that come up as her people witness the great prosperity following their recent development. It is evidence that they are welcoming cotton-mills, they are hailing manufactures, they are enriching themselves by mining industries. They are clamoring for these elements of Northern prosperity in the agricultural section of our country in the South as they are in the great West to which I belong. Everywhere they want various factories at home; and where there is no water-power they plant them where coal mines are found; and wherever they come property advances, new markets are created, and the farmer and all the people know that it is a welcome evidence and element of new prosperity.

Sir, there is a "new South," thank God, coming up, and yet to be more glorious than any former South in the history of this country. I warn gentlemen to beware of legislation that shall crush these incipient movements toward a new and powerful element of prosperity in the South.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to say something of the leanings of free trade toward a new system of taxation in this country. I have here from the Bureau of Statistics an estimate of the burdens to be imposed upon each State in this Union if the free-trade doctrines are carried to their legitimate result, which is inevitably the abolition of custom-houses and the substitution of a system of direct taxation. "Free trade and direct taxation" was the cry a few years ago, in a like contest with that which we are now passing through. This statement clearly and distinctly shows, upon the basis of only $250,000,000 of taxation for the support of the Government, how much will fall on each State of the Union—on agricultural Iowa, agricultural Louisiana, and every other State, manufacturing or non-manufacturing, if the Democratic party shall win the battle for free trade. If the people do not resist this effort to drag the country at the tail of the free-trade car, we shall logically and inevitably be compelled to accept the other branch of the system, and yield to "direct taxation." (See appendix A for table of direct taxation.)

In order to show the recklessness with which it is proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to deal with certain articles—among them bituminous coal, iron ore, copper ore, and wool—I desire to show the late development of these interests. I have obtained from the Bureau of Statistics a statement showing the extent of the interests which that proposition would seriously affect if not destroy. For example, in 1859, a free-trade year, the product of bituminous coal was only 6,218,000 tons; in 1880 it was 42,700,000 tons. Yet the gentleman proposes to deprive this industry of the benefit of the present system of legislation, irrespective of the vast army of laborers to whom it gives employment.

In respect to wool (and this affects the farming interest throughout the country from California to Maine) the statement shows the growth of that branch of industry to have been from 1859, 75,000,000 pounds, to 1880, 264,000,000 pounds. And this is to be thrown upon the free list without a thought of the hundreds of thousands of our people who would protest against this assault on their interest, or of the great farmers' capital now invested in it.

Now, sir, that is an indication, and only one indication, of the effect upon one branch of agriculture of his proposition, which includes "all raw materials." I have alluded to the prosperity of other branches. But when so moderate a free-trader as the gentleman from New York claims to be strikes at a so important farmers' interest as wool, what shall become of their other interests when Kentucky free-traders get in their blows? What is to become of the vast capital invested in sheep if you are to strike it down with a blow, and that coming from the professed friends of the farmers?

Mr. Speaker, I have within three days received a copy of the London Times, which shows the effect of a free-trade tariff, admitting wool from all the world free of duty, on agriculture in England.

Here is the copy of the Times containing the article, with the significant title, Agricultural Decline. It is dated April 19. It fills several columns of that journal. I will read from a summary of it contained in the Chicago Tribune of May 4. It says:

Compared with 1868 the census of 1881 shows the loss of sheep during the thirteen years has been striking. Not a county in England fails to show a loss in the number of sheep. During thirteen years the loss of sheep has been 5,548,000; in Wales, 201,000; Scotland, 381,000; Ireland, 1,564,000. Total for the United Kingdom, 7,712,000. This loss has not been in any one locality or season. It has been general and continuous, going on year after year, showing a permanent decline resulting from the unprofitableness of the sheep-growth.

And that is what they wish to make unprofitable here by doing what England has done, admitting wool from all countries free for the sole benefit of the manufacturer and for larger exportation of woolen goods. And this, too, notwithstanding (as this article goes on to say) a great increase of pasturage. There has been also an increased area of agriculture. And yet there is a dead loss of both capital and profits to the farmer.

This review of the agricultural decline of England as late as the 19th of last month, and covering a period of thirteen years, tells you that progressive ruin threatens British agriculture, and gives the facts to prove it. It comes, too, from the great organ of British free trade.

I will print some extracts from the summary of that article, and for the details refer gentlemen to the London Times of April 19, 1882. It is most pertinent to this discussion, and most important to American farmers.

There has been in some parts of the kingdom an increase in the number of cattle, and the increase stands good as a whole. But, taking sheep and bullocks together as constituting the live stock, the loss has been a great one. By way of comparison, the Times reduces them to one term as all sheep by taking each head of cattle as equivalent to six sheep. The loss in the number of cattle and sheep, reckoning each head of cattle as six sheep, is equal at the end of thirteen years to 3,268,000 sheep in England. The money value per sheep is put at $12.50, and the loss of money in England is about $41,000,000. That is the amount of farmers' capital invested in sheep and cattle alone which has been obliterated in England during the thirteen years. In Ireland and Wales there has been a slight increase, but Scotland shows a decrease; and the Times says: "This is, indeed, a sorry position at the close of thirteen years of agricultural toil, and expenditure, and application of improved methods in every process of husbandry, which should have greatly augmented the head of live stock as the most important portion of the visible wealth of the farmer."

This loss of so great a portion of the farmers' capital invested in live stock is made more striking because the decrease has taken place on a larger area of cultivated land, on a larger area of land devoted to pasturage, and on a greater number of acres devoted to the keeping of a smaller number of animals. In 1881 the increase in the number of acres under permanent pasture, clover grasses, green crops, and root crops (not including potatoes) is 3,377,000. The Times says that the bulk of the grass and feeding crops are realized in the form of animal produce, and their value is roughly measured by the number of animals which they feed. According to this, instead of the greater acreage of 1881 showing an accession of wealth it merely represents so much extra expenditure in all the costs of cultivation, and this to feed, not the same, but a reduced head of live stock. It requires, therefore, an increased area of 3,377,000 acres of pasture to feed the equivalent of 3,268,000 less sheep.

While this extension of area for the maintenance of more cattle and sheep has been going on, and the animals simultaneously falling off in number, the farmers have been abandoning a large breadth of their area for corn. (As compared with 1868, England has in the thirteen years given up 539,000 acres of grain crops, Wales 66,000, and Ireland 416,000 acres. While England has $40,000,000 less farmers' capital in live stock, it has a further $20,000,000 less in grain crops, and this irrespective of the falling off in yield.)

The decline in live stock, reckoned as sheep, upon each hundred acres of grass, root, and feed crops in England is equivalent to an average of sixty-one sheep, having a money value of $762. Commenting on this point, the London paper adds:

"British farmers have received lessons enough to turn more attention to pastoral rather than cereal husbandry; the enlarged area of their grass and green crops and decrease in the breadth sown with corn prove that they have been striving to carry out the advice; and the natural result should have been seen in a substantial advance in the head of live stock—especially after thirteen years' progress in management there should be a higher feeding power per acre besides the increase in number of acres of feeding crops grown. There is no escape from the conclusion that farmers would have multiplied their head of stock had they been able to do so."

During the same thirteen years, from 1868 to 1881, the decrease in the crop of lambs in Great Britain and Ireland was 3,029,000, while the increase in the number of cows and heifers in milk or in calf was in the whole kingdom only 9,000. Each calf is reckoned as the equivalent of six lambs, so the increase in the stock of cattle falls far short of the loss in sheep. Summing up the results of this elaborate comparison of statistics of agricultural decline in the kingdom, and especially in England, the Times says:

"We present the above statements illustrating the decline in agricultural wealth and production, leaving to farm occupiers and their landlords to consider how far the facts constitute an indictment against their craft or only a record of its misfortunes; how far the conditions under which farming is conducted are answerable for this failure to supply the demand for cheaper food; or whether the seasons alone are to blame, and no remedial measures, either legislative, social, or commercial, need be adopted for turning the land once more toward prosperity."

From this review it will be seen that the agricultural decline in Great Britain has not been due to the mere failure or partial failure of crops in any one year, but to a gradual and continuous shrinkage of the means and capital of the farmers. No class of men are better aware that the cultivation of grain is not profitable, and that live stock alone promises any permanent gain to the agriculturist; these statistics show how they have struggled to take advantage of this knowledge. They have in England alone abandoned a half-million of acres of grain-crops and devoted them to pasture; but the increased pasturage has failed to maintain even a smaller number of live stock. The flocks of sheep have shrunk far in excess of the increase in the proportionate herds of cattle, and the money value of the live stock, taking the two, sheep and cattle, together, shows a steady and heavy loss. The loss of the lands withdrawn from grain may be said to be total, because the addition of the grain lands to that devoted to the feed crops does not enable the farmers to increase their live stock, nor does it even enable them to maintain their previous numbers of stock. The live-stock crop, therefore, is diminishing, despite the millions of acres once producing grain but which are now devoted to pasture and to food for animals yearly, therefore the ability of England, or even of the United Kingdom, to produce the breadstuffs and the meats necessary to feed the population and British dependence on other countries for that food is becoming more ascertained and fixed; and this deficiency will continue to enlarge as agriculture becomes more and more unprofitable.

Against this proof of the influence of free trade on the farmers of England do you ask me to adopt like principles of free trade and apply them to the farmers of this country? Never, sir, until the prosperity now enjoyed by the farmers of the United States shall cease.

I shall not prolong this debate. I shall submit the question upon the arguments already made, and upon the plain, contrasted facts of American and of British economy. I expect no support for this bill from those opposed to the principle of protection in the tariff. I do expect support for it from all those who believe protection in any degree is needed for the security of our industries; because in that case we must have exact information of their mutual relations, of the cost and conditions of production at home and abroad, as the basis for a sound and reasonable tariff system. It will then belong to the House to approve, modify, or reject the recommendations of the commission. I call for a vote on the passage of the bill. [Great applause.]

APPENDIX A.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your schedule of inquiries of this day, I have to submit the following:

1. 2. Your first two questions are as follows: First. What was the consumption per capita in the United States of cereals in any years under low tariffs, say 1857, 1858, or 1859? Second. What was the consumption in the United States per capita in the year 1880 or 1881?

I am unable to give you this information for all of the cereals or for the particular time which you mention, but furnish you with two statements in regard to wheat and corn. (Inclosure A.) You will observe from the foot-note that the information in regard to the production of 1860 is for the year 1859, and the information in regard to the year 1881 is for the production of 1880.

3. Your third question, "What is the amount of wool produced in the United States in 1859 and in 1860?" I would answer as follows: product in 1859, 75,000,000 pounds; product in 1880, 264,000,000 pounds.

4. You inquire as to the amount of iron ore produced in 1859 and 1880. I cannot give you the data in regard to iron ore, but I can give it for pig-iron, which, I presume, will answer the same purpose. The amount of pig-iron produced in the United States in 1859 was 840,627 tons, and in 1880, 4,295,414 tons, (both amounts expressed in net tons of 2,000 pounds.)

5. In reply to your fifth inquiry, as to the production of bituminous coal, I would say that the production in 1859 was 6,218,080 tons, and in 1880 42,763,692 tons. I would also add in this connection that the production of anthracite coal in 1859 was 8,115,842 tons, and in 1880 it was 26,437,242 tons. (of 2,240 pounds.)

6. In reply to your inquiry in regard to copper I would say that the production in 1860 was 7,200 tons, and in 1879 it was 21,429 tons.

7. Your seventh question is as follows: "If customs revenues were abolished, give table showing the amount of direct tax to be raised in each State, under the constitutional provision, and on the basis of $250,000,000 a year?"

In reply I inclose to you herewith a table made out in accordance with your verbal explanation by telephone showing the apportionment of $250,000,000 among the States and Territories of the United States upon the basis of population in the year 1880.

I am, sir, very respectfully, yours,

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR.,
Chief of Bureau.

* In the column of "production" the amount placed opposite the fiscal year is the production of the preceding calendar year. For example: the quantity stated in the column of "production" opposite the year 1880 is the production of the calendar year 1879, since the exports of wheat and of corn during the year 1880 were principally of the respective crops of the calendar year 1879.

The production of both wheat and corn during the year 1869 is taken from the census report of the succeeding year. The production for the other years is taken from the annual reports of the Department of Agriculture.

I ask the Clerk to read the resolution of the majority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the contestant, A. A. Mabson, have leave to withdraw his papers without prejudice.

Mr. CALKINS. Before the vote is taken, I desire to say in behalf of the minority of the committee that it is not their desire to discuss the question at all, or to take a vote upon the minority report of the committee, the usual minority resolution, which would simply allow further time to take testimony I now move the adoption of the resolution which has been read.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which, on motion of Mr. PLUMB, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, of the 3d instant, with accompanying papers, in relation to a proposed amendment of the act of the 15th December, 1880, providing for the disposal of the Fort Dodge military reservation, Kansas. The subject is commended to the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 5, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports from Captain James Mercur, Corps of Engineers, upon examinations and surveys made in compliance with requirements in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1881, of Meherrin, Whiteoak, and New Rivers, North Carolina, and also of the water connection between the Waccamaw and Cape Fear Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of April 26, the histories of the Boston and Portsmouth navy-yards by Rear-Admiral George H. Preble.

Mr. HOAR. That matter ought to be in the possession of the Senate. It refers to a very important question which is being discussed in Boston, being a proposition to dispose of the Charlestown navy-yard. I do not feel like asking the Senate to print it. It is possible that on an examination some small portion of it relating to the matter of the title of that yard and its value for public defense may be printed. If there is no impropriety in the request, I ask to have it simply lie on the table. There is no occasion to refer it to any committee, because no committee of the Senate has the subject before it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication, with the accompanying papers, will lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. If the subject comes before the Senate, I shall then move to have these papers referred.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. COCKRELL, and Mr. PUGH the committee to inquire whether any money has been raised by contributions or otherwise for the purpose of promoting the passage or defeat of House bill No. 5656, to amend certain laws on the subject of distilled spirits in special bonded warehouses.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a preamble and resolutions of the General Assembly of Illinois; which were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Preamble and joint resolutions of the Thirty-second General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

Whereas in the execution of the coercive policy now practiced by the British Government in Ireland several American citizens have been arrested and imprisoned without having formal charges made against them, but upon the vague allegation of being "suspects," without indictment or arraignment before any tribunal, or other process of law, thus making punishment precede conviction of crime, a system in conflict with justice, repugnant to advanced civilization, and discourteous and insulting to a friendly nation; and

Whereas the victims of this injustice are in every instance citizens who formerly were subjects of Great Britain, but transferred their allegiance to the United States, thus making it apparent that a spirit of malicious persecution, because of such change of allegiance, underlies these outrages; and

Whereas under the Constitution and laws of the United States all citizens, native and foreign born, stand upon an equality and enjoy equal rights, among which is the right, if charged with a violation of law in any country with which the United States holds diplomatic relations, to a speedy trial under the laws of such country, and this fundamental principle has always been asserted and maintained by our Government, and is in fact the corner-stone upon which rests our marvelous national growth and development: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate of the State of Illinois, (the house of representatives concurring herein,) That it is the duty of the General Government, through its Chief Executive, its Congress, and its foreign ministers, to demand the speedy trial or unconditional release of those American citizens now in prison, and to declare in the most emphatic manner that the protection of the Republic shall be extended to all its citizens abroad who are not convicted of violation of law, and that the Department of Government or official who fails in the discharge of such duty deserves censure, and is unworthy of the confidence of the liberty-loving and law-governed American people.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby instructed to use their best efforts to secure as soon as possible such a recognition of the rights of American citizens abroad as will be consistent with our national dignity, and avert future capricious, arbitrary, or unjust interference with them.

Resolved, That copies of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be forwarded immediately to the President and our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Adopted by the Senate, April 20, 1882.

JOHN M. HAMILTON,
President of the Senate.
GEORGE TERWILLIGER,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives, April 25, 1882.

HORACE H. THOMAS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN A. REEVE,
Clerk of the House.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Illinois, ss:

I, Henry D. Dement, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a preamble and joint resolution adopted by the Thirty-second General Assembly of the State of Illinois, and filed in this office April 28, A. D. 1882.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix the great seal of State. Done at Springfield this 29th day of April, in the year of Lord 1882, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and sixth.

[SEAL.] HENRY D. DEMENT,
Secretary of State.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I present two petitions of sundry citizens of Texas in favor of a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. There is a special committee which I think has made a report on that subject. So I move that the petitions lie on the table, to be considered with the report.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of Asa P. Potter and other officers of national banks in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, largely in the city of Boston, in favor of a bankrupt bill which shall be substantially the bill known as the Lowell bill. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER presented a petition of citizens of Beaufort, South Carolina, praying for the establishment of a coaling dock and naval station at Port Royal Harbor, and a letter of Captain Jouette, United States Navy, on the same subject; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1842) providing for an extension of the Executive Mansion; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish it understood that this is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 655) granting a pension to Hiram Baum, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 340) granting a pension to Erastus Crippen, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1201) granting a pension to Jacob Nix, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1782) for the relief of Francis B. Van Hoesen, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 833) for the relief of John R. Taggert, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on Finance have directed me to report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. No. 1785) for the relief of David Mordecai and J. Randolph Mordecai, composing the commercial firm of Mordecai & Co., of Baltimore, Maryland. If there be no objection I ask that the bill be put on its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better be printed and let us see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1843) dedicating the military reservation at Plattsburgh, New York, to the village of Plattsburgh for a public park; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say that while the gentlemen who bring this bill to me are of the highest character and respectability, and I sympathize with what they desire, I do not commit myself to the propriety of giving away so much of the property of the Government without compensation. It may turn out that it is right, but I hold my opinion in reserve about that. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, which is the appropriate committee, I suppose, as it is a military reservation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1844) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying memorial, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1845) to authorize the Postmaster-General to extend the mail service in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORGAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1846) to expedite the administration of justice in the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUTLER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1847) prescribing the manner of instituting criminal proceedings in the United States courts; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GEORGE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1848) to repeal section 714 of the Revised Statutes, allowing pensions to judges in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GROOME asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 61) tendering the thanks of Congress to and conferring additional rank on Chief-Engineer George W. Melville, United States Navy, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

L. MADISON DAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the morning hour is closed, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of cases on the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. JONAS. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of L. Madison Day, which was passed over without prejudice.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, after the word "dollars," in line 6, to strike out "with interest on the same at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of July, 1874, until paid;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay unto L. Madison Day, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,400, that being the amount of purchase-money received by the United States from said Day for a parcel of land in the city of New Orleans condemned as the property of Judah P. Benjamin, but which was found not to be the property of the United States and of which the purchaser has been evicted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read

Mr. COCKRELL. There is an amendment proposing to strike out interest from the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is such an amendment, which is the pending question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I take it there is no objection to the amendment striking out interest on the amount.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that amendment being adopted, but I should like to have a statement of the case.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. The report in this case is very long and embraces a long statement of the facts and a long citation of authorities. Perhaps the Senate may not desire to have it read this morning, and I will state simply the case. Under the confiscation act the Government sold some property belonging to one Judah P. Benjamin, I think. Mr. Day was the purchaser and paid his money to the Government under that sale. Afterward the court decided that the confiscation or the pretended confiscation was entirely irregular, the sale was set aside, and the property was surrendered to the parties claiming it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The sale was set aside, do I understand the Senator to say?

Mr. CONGER. No; I say the courts decided that the sale was entirely irregular and therefore void. It was not set aside by any order of new proceeding that I know of. The money was paid into the Treasury which was received from Mr. Day. The land was gone, and the committee thought the money should be restored to the applicant.

There has been a large number of reports from committees of the House and Senate, and my recollection is that they were all in favor of repaying Mr. Day the amount of money which he paid at the sale of the land, without interest. Some committees have reported in favor of paying him interest, but in the report which I have made by order of the Committee on Claims he is to have the amount without interest.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The case is pretty familiar to me, as I examined it in the other branch. The difficulty was not exactly with the sale of the land. The trouble was that there was a mortgage of $10,000 and interest on these lots of land which were confiscated by the Government and sold at public sale. Under the order of the court the auctioneer who had the sale of the land declared that it was sold free from all mortgages whatsoever, and that if any mortgages existed upon it they should be canceled. When this Mr. Day bought the land and received his deed under the directions of the court the marshal gave him a deed free from all incumbrances, and especially in the deed erasing the mortgage of $10,000 which was upon the property and of record.

The mortgagee brought suit in the courts of Louisiana on that mortgage, and the courts sustained the mortgage, and the mortgage and interest being all the value of the property, L. Madison Day lost the whole property. In other words, the Government of the United States, by direction of the court having authority to do it, gave practically a warranty deed of this piece of land free from all incumbrances whatever, and especially free from the incumbrance which appeared of record. The courts held the incumbrance to be valid, and thus L. Madison Day lost his land, and the United States is in the position of deeding something which it did not have and taking five thousand and some odd dollars for a conveyance of property it did not own, and L. Madison Day is without the money and without the property, the United States with the money, and there is no reason on earth why he should not receive back the principal and the interest, except that unjust, outrageous, iron rule of the Government of the United States made by Congress that under no circumstances will the Government pay interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am afraid this matter is likely to prove rather a serious precedent, if you pass this bill. The committee of which I am a member, that on the Judiciary, has for fifteen years that I can remember had similar questions almost every session of Congress sent to it, and we have uniformly held, and the Senate has sustained us in every instance I think, that where the courts of the United States or the public officers of the United States undertake to sell confiscated property or property for taxes, upon well understood principles of law which every bidder understands perfectly and is bound by, the Government makes no guarantee of anything whatever. It sells the chance; it does not guarantee the regularity of the proceedings or the title to the property, or incur any obligation whatever upon the subject.

I do not believe there is a State in this Union which has tax laws that ever has provided for the restoration to the purchaser at a tax sale either of land or money, where the proceedings turned out to be irregular or illegal or the supposed owner had no title to the property. I know that it is only three or four years ago that an instance of this character occurred before us of a case at Alexandria, and I feel justified in saying that all the members of the committee, some of them sympathizing deeply with the claimant who claimed that his property had been taken from him without warrant of law, the Supreme Court having held that the confiscation was unwarranted by law—all of the members of the committee were of opinion that it would be entirely out of the regular order of the procedure of a government and establish a perfectly unjust and intolerable policy, to have it understood that anybody was to have any claim upon the United States in such a case. The purchaser understands upon common principles of law that he is merely purchasing at his own risk and peril. The property is usually in such cases worth a great deal more than the sum that is charged upon it or than he bids for it, as the case may be; he goes into it as a speculation, and it is at his own risk.

The United States has provided by law for two or three instances where a man holding under a confiscation or tax sale, I do not know whether it may not be both, having been evicted by the judgment of a court of the United States not the judgment of a State court, may have a certain measure of reimbursement. I do not remember the details and they are not important. This case of course does not fall within that principle, for if it did there would be no occasion to pass this bill. This gentleman appears to have bid at the auction. He knew the jurisdiction of the confiscating court; he knew that the authority of the judge and of the marshal was limited and pointed out by law; and that they had no more right to give him a guarantee of any kind than any Senator who hears me would have had to give him a guarantee or to charge the United States with a guarantee which any one of us would assert the United States would be bound by to him. There is the difficulty of the affair.

If you pass this bill upon the theory that is stated, you are obliged, if you are consistent, to reconsider a great many bills that we have rejected and to open the door everywhere in all cases of tax sales, internal revenue, customs sales, maritime seizures, everything, making the Government the responsible guarantor of the regularity of all proceedings just as in the cases of private parties who sell with a warranty. Governments have never done that; States have never done it; and they cannot do it obviously with any safety whatever. Therefore I shall be obliged to vote against the report of the committee, as much as I respect the sympathy which they have for this person.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to make a single inquiry. The Senator spoke of the petitioner knowing that the Government could convey only a limited or doubtful title, and knowing that it had no right to give a guarantee. Is there more than the presumption that the man ought to know? Is there any evidence that this petitioner actually did know that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose not. It is a mere question of law. The presumption is that the petitioner was an intelligent man and that he knew the commonest and simplest laws of his country, and going into a speculative purchase, as in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases in a thousand all such purchases are, he must be presumed, as we all are, to know the simple and common principles of law that in every State, I am sure I am safe in saying, govern such transactions.

Mr. HOAR. I entirely agree with the Senator from Vermont in the principle he states, and I have just myself prepared a report not yet submitted to the committee of which I am a member affirming and applying that principle as he states it. Unless this case is an exception to that rule, I cannot myself support the report of the committee, but it seems to me that it is.

As I understand it, the confiscation act purports in terms to authorize the sale of a fee of all the property or estate of a person who commits certain defined offenses. That was accompanied on the same date with a resolve that it should only operate to confiscate an estate for life, Congress being required by the Constitution to make that limitation. Thereupon it has been quite frequently held that a judgment of a court purporting to confiscate a fee must be interpreted in the light of that resolution, and held to confiscate only the life estate.

But here is a case where the court, proceeding according to the practice in admiralty, as it was expressly required to do by the statute, ordered a certain mortgage to be canceled upon the estate, and entered a decree or an adjudication that the mortgage was canceled, and sold the property, representing the fact to be that a previous mortgage upon it had been discharged by the court. The report made by the honorable Senator from Michigan finds that if the mortgage had been outstanding it would have equaled the entire value of the premises, and nobody would have bid a dollar for it unless the mortgage had been canceled.

Upon that mistake of the special fact, whether the mortgage had been discharged or not, the purchaser bought and paid his money. Then the mortgagee set up his mortgage and it was found that the proceedings of cancellation were irregular, and the purchaser, having got nothing whatever as an equivalent for his money, asks to have it paid back. It seems to me the United States should do what any honest man would do under those circumstances, refrain from holding it. It is not on the ground of implied warranty in my mind; it is not on the ground that a man who purchases a tax title does not take the whole risk as he ordinarily takes his chances, as the Senator from Vermont says; but this was a misunderstanding as to the existence of a fact, not of legal power or authority, whether a certain mortgage had been cleared off.

Mr. JONAS. I think this case is entirely dissimilar from a tax case, and I do not think the principles stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] apply at all. In this case the Government confiscated and undertook to sell a piece of real estate belonging to J. P. Benjamin, under the confiscation act. The property was sold for about six thousand dollars. The money was paid by Mr. Day, and the money is now in the United States Treasury. The Government undertook to give Mr. Day a full title to that property; it undertook to sell it free from mortgage. The deed recites that it is free from mortgage. A certificate of the court ordered the mortgage existing upon the property to be canceled, and the certificate of warranty showed Mr. Day that the mortgage was canceled. The presumption was that it was done with his money, instead of which the money was paid into the Treasury.

Afterward Mr. Day was disseized of the property at the suit of the mortgage creditors, who proceeded to enforce the mortgage against the property in the State court. The mortgage was recognized. The court decided that the United States court had no right to order the cancellation of the mortgage, and that the mortgagee's rights still subsisted upon it, and it was finally affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and Mr. Day was deprived of his property

Mr. Day at least bought the life-estate of J. P. Benjamin in that property. Mr. Benjamin is yet alive. The estate was valuable. Mr. Day has been disseized of his property for five years, and he would have held it all through the remainder of the time of Mr. Benjamin's natural life. This the Government guaranteed, according to the laws of Louisiana, where the sale was made.

I have not time in the few minutes allotted to me to go fully into the laws of the State of Louisiana, but under the system of laws which there prevails a judgment creditor and any person, either selling by actual sale or selling through judicial process, is held to warrant the existence of the thing which he sells. A judgment creditor is held to warrant the title of that which he sells to the person who purchases under execution. That is the law of the State of Louisiana, and I presume that even the United States cannot change the title to real estate within the State of Louisiana, except in accordance with the laws of the State of Louisiana.

Therefore, the United States having by judicial process provoked the sale of this property, having sold it in a proceeding in which the United States was plaintiff to an innocent purchaser, is held to the guarantees prescribed by the laws of Louisiana, which say in express terms and over and over again that he who sells a thing is bound to warrant, first, the existence of the thing sold; and, second, the title to the thing sold. Hence, wherever the purchaser is disseized of property in the State of Louisiana which he has purchased at a judicial sale, he has his recourse against the offender; that is, against the party plaintiff who provoked the sale.

This is a case not only of law but of equity. The money is in the Treasury of the United States. Mr. Day has been deprived of this property. The life-estate which he purchased would be still subsisting. He paid a full price for the property at the time at which it was sold, believing as many did at that time that he was purchasing the fee-simple, and having the right to believe it, because the United States so declared, and so declared in the deed which it gave. He believed that he was purchasing the fee-simple. He was informed by the court, by the officers of the court, and by the officers of the United States, that he was buying a piece of property free from any mortgage lien or incumbrance whatsoever. The property has been taken from him to satisfy this lien. The money is in the Treasury of the United States. It certainly would be contrary to law, unjust, and inequitable to the last degree that the Government of the United States should retain this money and profit by its own wrong.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, it fell to my lot to investigate this case when it was first presented to the Senate for consideration some years ago, and I made a report in it; and the more I have reflected on it the better I am satisfied of the views I then expressed with respect to this case. I made the report some three years ago. I entirely concur with the Senator from Louisiana, who has just taken his seat, in respect to the right of this party to the fund which was paid to the Government for this property.

The facts are few and simple. The Government of the United States under the confiscation law attempted to confiscate the fee-simple title to this property through its officers. Nobody can deny that the proceeding in the circuit court clearly showed that it was the purpose of the Government to convey to this man a fee-simple title to this property. It was not like a sale under execution, where the purchaser goes and buys all that the sheriff can sell him. Far from it. It was a case in which the property was sold under a direct order of the court specially directed to it. When an execution issues upon a general judgment against a defendant no such proceeding takes place as took place in this instance. In execution sales the sheriff is authorized to sell the right, title, and interest of the defendant in the execution, any property that he can find, and the whole thing rest with the sheriff. If he takes hold of a piece of property and the defendant in execution is found to have little or no interest, and a purchaser at a sale pays value for it, he takes just what the sheriff can sell, and he has no recourse for the return of his money.

Mr. JONAS. Even in such a case as that under the laws of Louisiana the plaintiff has recourse.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am speaking according to the course of the common law. I know the law is different in the Senator's State, but I state the common law. In nine-tenths of the States of the Union that is the rule; that where the sheriff levies on property and the purchaser buys it, he takes the title the sheriff can give him, and the court has nothing to do with it. But this case is entirely different, and even according to common-law principles this purchaser is entitled to his money; and Judge Bradley sitting in my State, holding the circuit court of the United States, affirmed this principle in a case reported in 2 Woods. Where a party bought at a bankrupt sale property which was supposed to have been divested of the lien of a mortgage under the action of the district court, the district court assuming the right to order a sale discharged of the lien where it did not have the power to do so, and it turned out afterward that the court's order was void, he ordered the refunding of the purchase-money to the party who bought at that sale under the supposition that he was obtaining a title free from the mortgage. That case is precisely analogous to the one before the Senate in legal principle.

The district judge in that case directed the bankrupt's estate disposed of free of the mortgage lien, just as the court in Louisiana ordered this property sold clear of the mortgage lien. The mortgage creditor, not concurring in the action of the district court, prosecuted a writ of review after the purchaser had paid his money and took the case to the circuit court, where it was reviewed by the judge of the Supreme Court assigned to that circuit, and that judge held that the action of the district court was void; that the district judge had no right to order the sale of the estate discharged of the lien of the mortgage, and therefore he directed that the money paid by the purchaser, amounting to $65,000 or $75,000, should be refunded to him, and the case is on record; I have not had time to obtain it. That was the decision of Judge Bradley, even in a State where the common law prevailed, and independent of the special code in Louisiana to which my friend has alluded, which is far more equitable in its principles than the common law in cases of this kind.

Day purchased this property under the assurance of the court that it was to be sold discharged of that lien, and the record shows it, and afterward it turned out when the supreme court of Louisiana came to deal with the case that that proceeding was void, and the property was sold not charged with the lien but subject to it, and when the mortgage came to be foreclosed upon the property it swallowed up the whole of the estate and left Day without any title, with his money in the Treasury of the United States.

That is the case. It has been compared to the case of a sale under an execution running generally against a defendant without regard to any direction to sell specific property; but that is not this case. The district court in Louisiana had before it the identical property bought by Day when it ordered it to be sold, and it ordered the mortgage to be canceled. It gave notice to the purchaser at the sale that he would get a title discharged of the lien of the mortgage; but afterward that was held to have been void; and I ask, is it not clear that this man was misled by the authority of the Government? For really the officers of the court in that proceeding were nothing but the officers of the United States representing its interests and who were ordered to sell this property for the benefit of the United States.

In my judgment it is as clear a case in favor of this man as was ever before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I must confess my utter astonishment at the statements which have been made by the Senators arguing in behalf of this bill. This case has been before the Senate long enough for the facts to be known and recognized. Now I will state the facts as they are, and not as they are imagined to be.

Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin, his brother, were the record owners of this land. That is a fact which the Senators who advocate the passage of this bill ignore. The record in Louisiana shows that Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin were the absolute owners of the title to this lot of land. The record further shows that Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin executed a deed of mortgage in 1858, in that mortgage deed reciting their joint and equal ownership to the land, to Mrs. Micou.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The question I desire to ask is this: Did not the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana find that Judah P. Benjamin was the owner of this property?

Mr. COCKRELL. Never; there is no such finding. I say it is not the fact, and the record does not show it. Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin were the owners of this land, and they executed a mortgage to Mrs. Micou in 1858, in that mortgage reciting that each one of them was the owner of an undivided half of this land. That was on record, and L. Madison Day is as able a lawyer nearly as there is in the State of Louisiana, and he is one of the shrewdest in the whole State of Louisiana.

Now we come to 1862, July 17, when the Congress of the United States passed the confiscation act. That confiscation act went to the President of the United States and he approved the act and with his approval sent to the Congress of the United States a veto message which he had prepared, and which he intended to send to the Congress if Congress had not on the same day, July 17, 1862, passed a joint resolution which I have before me, a resolution spread upon the records of the statutes of the land, and known to Mr. Day and every other lawyer in the country. Now I will read what the statute says. On the pretext that he was buying the fee of Judah P. Benjamin, or the fee of this property, let us see what the law says——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me to explain what I meant by that? It was that Day had a right to suppose he was buying discharged of the mortgage lien.

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, we will see what he was buying. Mr. Day got everything he bought; and he has it now.

Mr. JONAS. Has he the life estate?

Mr. COCKRELL. He has the life estate subject to the lien that was upon it and under which he bought, and L. Madison Day has bought and realized everything that could be sold. I will read the joint resolution of July 17, 1862:

That the provisions of the third clause of the fifth section of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," shall be so construed as not to apply to any act or acts done prior to the passage thereof; nor to include any member of a State Legislature, or judge of any State court, who has not, in accepting or entering upon his office, taken an oath to support the constitution of the so-called "Confederate States of America;" nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life.

"Beyond his natural life." This was an act "to punish treason." The Constitution fixes that Congress cannot punish treason with the forfeiture of estate beyond the life of the traitor. A lawyer of ability and shrewdness, with this statute upon the books of the country and the Constitution staring him in the face, comes in and says that he thought he bought the absolute fee-simple title of this property.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will it interrupt the Senator on that point for me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly not.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the date of that act?

Mr. COCKRELL. July 17, 1862.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator turn to the act passed in August, 1861, independent of that, and see how far that extends?

Mr. COCKRELL. That was not the act under which the proceedings were had?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. How does the record show it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not remember about the act of 1861.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In the act of August 6, 1861, you will find absolute proceedings authorized by the court without any limitation.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not make any difference what was authorized; here was the message of Mr. Lincoln proposing to veto this act if the resolution of the same date had not been passed declaring the true intent and meaning of the act to be that nothing but a life estate was to be sold. Now let us get at the facts.

Mr. MAXEY. Why does not the principle of caveat emptor apply?

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course it does.

Mr. MAXEY. Why, did not the purchaser buy at his own risk?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Texas puts the question whether he bought the title at his own peril. Certainly caveat emptor applies. But now let us look a little further into the facts of this case, not the imagination of sympathetic Senators. The confiscation proceedings were begun in 1864. The notice of the court—now listen to it—here is the notice of the court to the world of what the court was going to do:

An order of publication was made, by which all persons interested in the property were required to appear on the 13th of February, 1865, to answer and to show cause why—why said property and real estate, and the right, title, and interest therein of the said J. P. Benjamin should not be condemned and sold.

"Why"—what?

Express notice to the world that the proceeding was against the right, title, and interest of Judah P. Benjamin in the property. Now we come to the record of the court made in April, 1865——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PLATT in the chair.) The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the last word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is in order; but the Chair will suggest that the Senator may go on by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is any objection to my going on, I move to strike out the last word, and ask for five minutes on that motion, and I will keep on till I get through. ["Go on."] I will consume no more time than is absolutely necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senator can proceed by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. In 1865 the order of sale was made. It was an order to sell this land of Judah P. Benjamin. Joseph Benjamin was not a party to it directly or indirectly. After that order of sale was made, but before the sale—after the judgment of condemnation but before the sale had taken place—one Durell, a judge of the United States district court there, who, as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts once said, resigned to escape impeachment, did—what? He entered an order upon the records of his court, but not in this case, nor as a part of the judgment in this case, but a general order directing the marshal to cancel all mortgages and liens upon all condemned or confiscated property. That was the order. It was not a part of the judgment in this case. L. Madison Day says—I state a conceded fact now—that he did not know of the existence of that order when he bought the land. What good did it do him; what injury was it to him if he did not know anything about it? Another fact——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Would that change the legal effect of it?

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course in the equity of the case it would change the whole phase of it. He claims now that this order canceled this mortgage, and therefore gave him an equitable right, a right to believe that he was buying a clear title. That is the argument. Now, the fact is he did not know of the order of cancellation; he did not know that an order had been made canceling the mortgage. It was no benefit to him.

Now, I state a further fact:

Claimant states that he "was not aware of the fact that Joseph Benjamin ever owned one-half of the property in question or that any other person had any interest in the property but J. P. Benjamin; was not aware that Mrs. Anna Micou had a mortgage upon that property; had no knowledge of any mortgage existing upon that property whatever, until the marshal's deed with a certificate of erasure annexed to said deed was delivered to me."

Mr. Day did not know that Joseph Benjamin had any title in that real estate, and yet the deed of Judah P. Benjamin gave one-half to Joseph Benjamin and one-half to Judah P. The very title of the man he was buying from showed he only had a half. There the mortgage was. He says he did not know anything about it when he bought. He says he did not know anything about this order until the marshal's deed was delivered to him, reciting the order of cancellation of the mortgage. Now, what equity has he on account of the title, only one-half being in Judah P. Benjamin, and on account of this mortgage and on account of this order of cancellation? None at all. He did not know anything about them; they give him no equity; they give him no right.

Now, Mr. President, what was this case? The United States sold the right, title, and interest of Judah P. Benjamin in and to this real estate to L. Madison Day, a speculator in confiscated real estate, for $5,400. He thought he was getting a splendid estate. He had previously bought it under a tax sale in 1864, as the records show. This was another title to be added to his tax title. He gave $5,400 for this and some other property. We do not know whether it has proved to be valuable or not. This was not all the property that was bought. A few years afterward—this was in 1865—Mrs. Micou's heirs brought suit to foreclose her mortgage against Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin, and Don Pardee, circuit judge of Louisiana, decided that the mortgage was valid and Durell's order, as every decent lawyer in the Union knew, was a nullity. That case was taken by Mr. Day to the supreme court of the State of Louisiana, and they decided that the mortgage was good, and the property must be sold to pay it. Then it was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and they unanimously decided that Mr. Day got all he bought—the right, title, and interest of J. P. Benjamin; that that right, title, and interest was subject to every lien and incumbrance which Judah P. Benjamin had put upon it; that one of these incumbrances was the deed of trust to Mrs. Micou; and Day took it subject to that.

The mortgage was foreclosed; the property has not proved as valuable as was anticipated, and Day declined to pay off the mortgage, and let the premises be sold. His title did not fail; he was not ousted; there was nothing declared null and void about it. The judgment of the court in rem against Benjamin's right, title, and interest stands to-day, and had Day paid off the mortgage there would have been no disturbance of his title during the life-time of Judah P. Benjamin; but he refused to pay off the mortgage, he let the property sell, and the title which he got subject to the mortgage passed away, and he now comes to Congress for a return of his money.

Let me put it to the Committee on Claims: if this property had proved to be worth $100,000 when the mortgage for $20,000 was foreclosed, would L. Madison Day be here in Congress asking for his $5,400? I appeal to Senators, had the property proved as he anticipated, a speculation, had it been worth $100,000 and a $20,000 mortgage was foreclosed on it, and $80,000 left, would L. Madison Day be here claiming that his title failed? What would he have done with the $80,000? He would have put it in his pocket, and not one dollar of it would have come into the United States Treasury. But he made a bad bargain, and his speculation has not proved as profitable as he anticipated.

Mr. President, will you pass this bill? It has now been reported favorably. The first report which was made upon it in 1876 by the Senate Committee on Claims was adverse. It was reconsidered, and a majority report of five out of nine members reported in favor of it in the Senate in the Forty-fourth Congress. It was the same way in the Forty-fifth Congress. In the Forty-sixth Congress it was reported favorably in the House, and defeated on a test vote after full argument. The House of Representatives in the Forty-sixth Congress defeated the bill after very full argument; but it comes back again, and now we are asked to hold that the United States are guarantors; that under the laws of Louisiana, the local laws of that State, at every sale made by the United States the Government becomes a guarantor of the title. Why, Mr. President, there is no failure of title here—not a particle. The right, title, and interest of Judah P. Benjamin for his life, all that could be sold, all that was attempted to be sold, all that was bought, passed to L. Madison Day. My good friend from Maine shakes his head. I ask him how was it otherwise? L. Madison Day himself did not know of the order canceling the mortgage, and did not know that Joseph Benjamin owned one-half of the property until after he received his deed.

Mr. FRYE. Let me ask the Senator this question: Does L. Madison Day say anywhere that he was ignorant of the general order of the court that in those sales all mortgages should be canceled?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read what he says.

Mr. FRYE. He does not say that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read what he says. I have it here verbatim:

Claimant states that he "was not aware of the fact that Joseph Benjamin ever owned one-half of the property in question, or that any other person had any interest in the property but J. P. Benjamin; was not aware that Mrs. Anna Micou had a mortgage upon that property; had no knowledge of any mortgage existing upon that property whatever until the marshal's deed with a certificate of erasure annexed to said deed was delivered to me."

Mr. FRYE. But that does not answer my question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was it material whether he knew of the existence of the order that canceled liens when he did not know there was any lien?

Mr. FRYE. There is this material about it: there was a public statement made at the sale of this land that all existing mortgages whatsoever, by order of the court, would be canceled. On the strength of that statement the man was not called upon to look into the record or inquire as to mortgages. He had the statement authorized by the court that all mortgages should be canceled. I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, and I say that under that statement there is not a court of equity in any State of the United States of America that would not grant to the purchaser, under the circumstances stated by the Senator, relief, and order the payment back of that money.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator answer this question? Suppose this property had proved to be a very valuable investment and had yielded Mr. Day $50,000, would he be under any equitable right to refund that money to the Government?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly he would not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then because it has proved a failure the Government must refund. In other words, the Government takes all risks, if there is any failure or depreciation of the property, but if it goes up the purchaser gains everything.

Mr. FRYE. No, Mr. President; but the Government, when it is the seller, and makes itself public official statements at the time of the sale, must in honor, at any rate take the risk of those statements so far as not to keep the money it has got by the strength of those statements. The idea of the United States Government making a statement at a public sale, and on the strength of that statement getting $5,000, and then when the statement proves a failure refusing to refund it!

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the Senator cannot answer the problem that I put, and no Senator who favors this bill can. It was a speculation by the purchaser.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose he had himself advertised for sale a farm, and stated that it would be sold free of mortgage, and thereupon I bought it on that statement and paid him $5,000 for it, and it turned out that it was not free of mortgage, but that there was a mortgage on it to its full value, would he keep the $5,000?

Mr COCKRELL. I do not understand the first part of the question that the Senator put.

Mr. HOAR. I will repeat it. Suppose my honorable friend from Missouri had advertised that he would sell a piece of land free of mortgage——

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand it now. No: I would not.

Mr. HOAR. You would not keep the money?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir; but that is not a parallel case. Here it was not the United States that was doing so and so, it was not the Treasury of the United States or the people of the United States that were making these representations. The people of the United States had passed a confiscation law, they had expressed their will in that law; they had passed a joint resolution declaring what they would sell the right, title, and interest of the party during his life, nothing more and nothing less. No officer under the United States had any right or authority to make any representations outside of the law. Suppose a sheriff of a county selling under an execution in favor of my friend from Massachusetts, when he is not present, when he knows nothing about it, announces upon the stand that he is selling the property of F. M. COCKRELL, with no mortgages upon it, and he sells it and realizes $5,000, and it was paid over to my good friend, Mr. HOAR, from Massachusetts, and afterward it turns out that the right, title, and interest of F. M. COCKRELL in the land was not worth a dollar, will my friend from Massachusetts refund the $5,000 to the purchaser of my right, title, and interest when the sheriff had no authority under the law to make the representation, and when he gave no authority for him to do it?

Mr. HOAR. That is just what I was going to ask the Senator in another connection—what he would do, suppose the auctioneer, whether sheriff or anybody else——

Mr. COCKRELL. Put the case of a judicial officer acting under the law, and not a private agent.

Mr. HOAR. Very well, either way. Suppose the person making the sale had said, "I sell the property of A B, I make this sale free of mortgages," and thereupon the Senator had bought it, paid his $5,000, and that had been handed over to me, does the Senator think that either he or I would keep the money under such circumstances?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have just said what I thought the Senator would do.

Mr. HOAR. My friend will pardon me if I add one sentence, if it is not trespassing too much on his good nature.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly not.

Mr. HOAR. It is not the case of holding the United States to a warranty at all. That is not my point. It is asking the United States whether it will keep the money, the purchaser having been led at the sale by the officer of the law to believe that he was buying property on which the mortgage had been canceled when it had not been canceled. It is not the question whether the United States shall make good the loss by a mistake; it is a question whether it shall profit by the mistake. That is all there is of it. I should be as sure that the Senator from Missouri would not take from me the $5,000 if he stood in the condition of the United States under these circumstances almost as I should if I had the money in my pocket.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator will permit me a moment——

Mr. COCKRELL. I was going to close in a minute.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well, I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator wishes to put a question, I will hear it with pleasure.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator to a statement made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in regard to what he understood the law to be in reference to tax sales. The Senator from Vermont, as I understood him, stated that no municipality that had the right of taxation could be held liable where property had been sold at a tax sale if it turned out afterward that the tax levy was void. That is not the law in my State. If it appears that the tax was illegally levied so that the person who purchased at the tax sale took no title, took nothing, the municipality under the authority of which that tax was levied is liable to the person who purchased for the amount of the tax that he paid. That is the law in the State of New York. It has been so decided by the court of appeals of the State of New York in a case that went up, if I recollect aright, from the city of Brooklyn. The city of Brooklyn levied a tax upon certain property; it turned out that the tax was illegally levied; in other words, that the tax was void; that the person who purchased at the tax sale took nothing under it; and the court of appeals held that the city of Brooklyn was liable to repay the amount that the purchaser paid at that tax sale.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Vermont and my distinguished friend from Wisconsin can settle that question of law, as I have not touched upon it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I should like to have the Senator touch upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is merely local law depending in each State on the laws of the State.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think the case is very analogous to this.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think there is any analogy at all. Here is the want of analogy: These proceedings, I assert, were regular from beginning to end; there was no defect in the proceedings; there was no irregularity; there has been no fraud in any part of these proceedings. L. Madison Day got everything he bought, the right, title, and interest of Judah P. Benjamin for his life. No court has said that his purchase was invalid, but it was declared to be subject to a mortgage, and that mortgage was foreclosed and the property was not worth the amount of the mortgage and the amount which L. Madison Day had paid. The proposition here involved is a bold one; it is that in all the confiscation sales which have been made in this country, if the purchaser failed to make the amount of his purchase-money out of the property, the Government shall refund, but if he made a good speculation he shall pocket the speculation, and the Government get nothing from it. There is the alpha and the omega of the L. Madison Day case.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me, right there, to go with his last sentence, it is not the alpha and omega of the L. Madison Day case. An officer of the United States Government authorized at a public sale a statement to be made that certain land was free from all mortgages whatsoever; if any mortgages existed, that when the Government gave the deed those mortgages should be canceled in the deed. Whether that officer of the Government had a right to make that statement or not, whether it was by order of Durrell or anybody else, I do not care, the money on the strength of it was paid over to the amount of over $5,000; the Government of the United States ratified the whole thing by taking the money obtained through the statement of its officer and putting the money into the United States Treasury. Then when it turned out that that statement on the part of the officer was false in law, that there was a mortgage upon it, that there was a mortgage worth more than the whole real estate sold by the Government, the Government is to keep, according to the Senator from Missouri, and ought to keep the $5,000 it got out of one of its own citizens by a false representation made at the time of the sale. There is no conflict of facts about that.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, I was not in when this debate began, and therefore am not aware of very much that has been said; but I want to say in explanation of the vote that I propose to cast upon this bill that I disagree very decidedly with the position taken by the Senator from Missouri, whose speech I have heard. It seems to me that a mere presentation of the facts of this case is enough to show that it is a meritorious one and that the claim of Mr. Day ought to be paid by Congress.

What are those facts? The United States Government, in its own name, and for its own benefit, instituted a proceeding in one of its own courts, under the act of 1862, known as the confiscation act, upon which it obtained a decree for the confiscation and sale of certain real estate alleged to be that of Judah P. Benjamin, after full notice had been given by publication to all persons interested in that estate to come in and show cause, if any they had, why such decree of confiscation and sale should not be had. The United States marshal applied to that court and obtained from it a general order, under section 8 of that act, which authorized the court to provide the forms of decrees, and to direct such deeds to be delivered to the purchasers, under sales under that act, as should vest good and valid titles to the property sold in the purchasers, declaring that not only the interest of the disloyal defendant but of all parties whatever in the estate should be sold. The United States marshal, acting under that decree and that general order, represented that he was selling and did attempt to sell the whole corpus of the estate free and discharged from all liens upon it, and in the deed which he gave to the purchaser recited the fact that he had so sold it free from all liens, and appended thereto a certificate of the recording officer of Louisiana that the mortgage against said real estate was canceled.

The purchaser paid the whole purchase-money to the marshal; and it, less the costs of the confiscation proceedings and of sale, was paid into the United States Treasury, where it still remains. No direct attempt was ever made to reverse or set aside the proceedings of the United States district court. Later on, however, the holders of a mortgage upon the real estate, which mortgage had been directed to be canceled by the court and had been entered upon the record as canceled as required by the order of the court, came into a State court of Louisiana and asked that court to pass a decree declaring that mortgage still to be in full force, and directing a sale for its foreclosure, notwithstanding the proceedings theretofore had in the United States district court; and the State court passed a decree reinstating that mortgage and declaring that the property should be sold under foreclosure proceedings unless this claimant chose within ten days to come in and pay the principal and interest of the mortgage and the costs of the proceeding.

From this decree Mr. Day appealed, first, to the supreme court of Louisiana, and afterward to the Supreme Court of the United States, both of which sustained the proceedings of the State court of Louisiana. As a consequence the property, which was not worth the amount owing upon the mortgage, including interest and cost, was again sold and was purchased by another party, and the title which Mr. Day had obtained through the confiscation proceedings was divested. Under these circumstances, those who oppose the repayment of this money out of the Treasury of the United States to L. Madison Day are compelled to claim that he purchased the property at his own risk.

It may be that this claimant was bound to know the law better than the United States district attorney who asked the court to decide and to order that under it the whole corpus of the estate, and not merely the interest of the disloyal defendant therein, should be sold; better than the United States district judge who decided that that was its true construction; better than the United States marshal, who, acting on that construction, represented that he was selling and did attempt to sell and convey the property free, clear, and discharged from the lien; and better than the recorder of the State of Louisiana, who gave his certificate of the cancellation of the mortgage, and so entered it of record. But I think it is too plain for serious controversy that the doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply to any case where a purchaser has been induced to become such by the representation of the seller or the seller's agent that he is selling an unencumbered title and where it turns out that that representation is false and the party is evicted in consequence of the incumbrance.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Maryland if the statement made by the marshal, or sheriff, or auctioneer, contradicting what the record shows, would bind between vendor and vendee? Whether the statement made by him against the record would not be ultra vires?

Mr. GROOME. I will answer the Senator without the slightest hesitation——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be continued. That is the understanding.

Mr. GROOME. Ordinarily the United States is in no way responsible for the tortuous acts or unauthorized representations of its marshals or other officers when engaged in the execution of civil or criminal process intrusted to them. But when——

Mr. MAXEY. My question is whether a statement not justified by the record would bind?

Mr. GROOME. I was endeavoring to answer that question affirmatively. Whenever a marshal, in the execution of process for the direct benefit of the United States upon a suit brought by the United States itself, makes a representation which is false, and which is not known to be false by the party who is induced to purchase in consequence of it, although the representation was unauthorized at the time it was made. Yet if the United States Government receives into its Treasury the purchase-money which is obtained in consequence of that representation, and refuses upon that representation being brought to its knowledge to return the purchase-money to the purchaser, it ratifies the act of the marshal in making that representation and becomes as absolutely bound by it, both in equity and in law, as if it had in the most solemn manner expressly authorized the marshal to make it.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not think the Senator quite caught the point I intended to make. The public record is notice to all the world; and if in the face of that public notice to the world the auctioneer, marshal, or sheriff makes a representation against that record, my question is whether that statement would bind the grantor?

Mr. GROOME. I say again that it would. The record is constructive notice to the world of the fact which it contains; but constructive notice is not to avail against an actual representation to the contrary. When this marshal ordinarily in the absence of a law such as the law of the State of Louisiana, to which the Senator has alluded and by reason of which, as he says, caveat emptor never applies to sales made in his State, makes a sale without making any representation as to the character of the title he is selling, the purchaser would be bound to look to the record, and if he failed to do so and bought a defective or encumbered title his loss would be the result of his own carelessness, and, having secured all that he bought, or had any right, growing out of any act of the seller or his agent to suppose he bought, he would have no claim to have his purchase-money refunded.

But when an affirmative representation is made by the officer of the United States making the sale that he is selling an unencumbered fee, and it subsequently turns out that the representation is false, and that the property is encumbered for more than its entire value, the United States cannot in law, equity, or common honesty retain the purchase-money in its Treasury, and deny that it is bound by the representation made on its behalf by its official. By accepting the purchase-money it adopts the representation through which it was obtained, and is estopped from denying that the marshal made it by its direction, and consequently if the representation is false, and results in injury to the purchaser, it is bound to indemnify him from loss.

But even if I am wrong upon the legal proposition, the Government of the United States ought to so conduct itself in its monetary transactions with its citizens as to avoid even the suspicion of unfairness, and it cannot afford to resort to technical and frivolous pretexts for refusing to pay claims against it which are based upon strong, inherent equities.

I hope, therefore, that not only this claim but that every claim against the Government, whether strictly legal or not, which rests on broad and solid foundations of equity may be paid, to the end that the Government may do full justice to its citizens, and that the love of the citizens for the Government and their determination to uphold at all times and in all ways the national honor, may steadily grow in strength.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has spoken once.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let him go on. ["No objection."]

Mr. JONES, of Florida. We have not been obeying the rule on this bill.

I referred in the short statement I made a while ago to a case which I think decided this question as clearly as any question ever was decided by an intelligent court. I referred to the case of Davis et al., trustees, vs. The Railroad Company et al, decided by Judge Bradley, where the district judge had directed the property of a railroad company to be sold discharged of a mortgage lien generally, in bankruptcy; and the property was so sold, and the purchaser bought it for what everybody believed at the time to be only a nominal price, $65,000 for a property that was worth half a million, and still relying upon the order of the court directing the sale of that property discharged of the lien, he bought it, and he bought at his own risk to a certain extent.

Afterward the holders of the mortgage, the mortgagees, denying the right of the district judge to sell the railroad discharged of the lien, instituted a petition of review and brought the case before the circuit judge, and the circuit judge held that the district court had no right to sell the railway discharged of the mortgage, and that the purchaser had a right to rely upon the order of the district judge when he bought, and inasmuch as he bought with the expectation that he was taking the property discharged of the lien, he was entitled to a return of the purchase-money. Here is what the court said:

> The question then arises as to the disposition to be made of the purchase money paid or secured to be paid by the respondents. The purchasers insist that it should be returned; the assignee that it should be retained by him for the benefit of the general creditors.
> From an examination of the evidence, it seems clear that the assignee assumed to sell the property clear of the mortgage. He did not profess to sell the mere equity of redemption.

So the marshal in this case did not profess to sell the property otherwise than as discharged of the lien:

> The respondents in their answer claim that the sale was made free from the lien of the mortgage. They claim that the mortgage was void. And while it is true that the petitioners gave notice at the time of the sale that it would be subject to their lien, the assignee and the purchasers did not act on this view. The latter never intended to purchase subject to the lien, but clear of the lien.
> Had the receiver sold the property subject to the lien of the first mortgage, the amount bid for it by the respondents would have been payable by them, and would have been a proper asset of the bankrupt company's estate. But as they did not sell it in that manner, but sold it as unencumbered property, so far as the first mortgage was concerned, and as that was a clear mistake, since the first mortgage was a valid lien and absorbed the entire property—

Just exactly the case here—

> the sale ought to be held invalid, and the proceeds of the sale ought to be returned to the purchasers. This is clearly the justice of the case, and in my judgment the law is not contrary thereto.

If ever there were two cases——

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. LAPHAM. In that case the mortgage covered the entire property which was purchased.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. So it did.

Mr. LAPHAM. In this case, if I recollect the facts aright, Mr. Day purchased additional property to what was covered by the mortgage.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is not my information.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably it is so. The report shows it.

Mr. LAPHAM. That is the fact. Now, is there any evidence in the case as to the value of the additional property?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is not my understanding of the facts.

Mr. LAPHAM. Then one other——

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to state to the Senator from New York that my recollection is that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] states in his report that the property purchased would have been worthless, utterly and absolutely worthless, if this mortage had been upon it.

Mr. LAPHAM. There was additional property included in the purchase. Is there any evidence what was the value of that?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The purchases were not at the same sale, I understand.

Mr. LAPHAM. All at one sale.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No, they were sold as distinct lots of property.

Mr. LAPHAM. One other fact; it appears that Mr. Day went into possession of this property and had possession of it for several years. Is there any evidence what he realized out of that?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That was the fact in the case decided by Judge Bradley; the party had been in possession for a long time.

Mr. LAPHAM. Was he not required to account for the use?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. He was not required to make any account at all.

Mr. LAPHAM. That is a very extraordinary doctrine. I do not see why the whole purchase-money should be refunded.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I say that if there were ever two cases alike in principle, they were the case of Day and this case decided by Judge Bradley. There the district court directed the mortgaged property to be sold discharged of the lien of the mortgage, although it had not power to do it, and the circuit court declared on review that that action was void; and although the party went into possession of the estate and held it for years Judge Bradley said in view that he had a right to regard the mortgage as discharged and purchased with the idea that it was discharged, he was entitled to full restitution of the purchase-money, which he obtained to the amount of $67,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose in the private case between private suitors from which he has read, the purchase-money had been paid over to the orator in the cause if it were an equity cause, or to the plaintiff in the action at law, whichever it was, does the Senator think it has been decided, or ever will be, that the purchaser of the property could go back to the party in the suit and get his money refunded?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, it will be time enough to deal with that case when it comes up. It is a sufficient answer to the Senator from Vermont to say that this is not that case. I know very well that the rights of parties are sometimes lost by a confusion of goods, by the fund being diverted, by a sheriff making away with the money, or by all trace of it being lost; but as long as it is within the reach of the law and the court a remedy is available. In the case I referred to a while ago the money was in the hands of the court. In this case the money is within the control of the Government. Its own officers acting for its benefit directed the property to be sold discharged of the lien.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, if my friend will pardon me, but I submit to him that the distinction there is, even in private cases—which I suggest to him have not anything to do with this—so long as the money is under the control of the court, whether in the form of security or money, if the court discovers that there has been any mistake or misunderstanding or error it can reverse its proceedings, its orders, and restore the money to the party who paid it in, but not after the court has acted and has gone through with its own operations, and the money has gone into the hands to which by the judgment of the law as administered, right or wrong, it is to go. Then quite a different principle applies.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Ah, Mr. President, I appreciate for the first time the point which the Senator from Vermont attempts to make in this case; but I am sure that upon reflection he would not insist upon it. I am sure that he would not take the ground that where the Government of the United States, acting through its own judicial officers, succeeded in obtaining a sum of money from the sale of the property of one of its citizens and that money was paid over to the Treasury of the United States, that case would be analogous to the one that I suggested a while ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By no means, Mr. President. That is not the point. I only stated that point to convince my friend that his legal analogy between the private judgment that he has been referring to and this fails. My ground of objection to this claim is the broader one that I stated before. I have only called the Senator's attention to this in view of that decision. That is all.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, for the life of me I cannot see in equity or in principle the least difference between the two cases. In the case in Louisiana the district judge, under the confiscation law, assuming to himself the right to direct the sale of the property discharged of the lien, did so; in the case in Florida the district judge, under the bankrupt law, assuming the right to sell the estate discharged of the lien, did so; and the purchaser bought at both sales under like circumstances. There was the order of the court under the bankrupt law directing the marshal to sell the railroad discharged of the first mortgage lien; and in the case in Louisiana under the confiscation law the court directed the property to be sold discharged of the lien of the mortgage. Where is the difference?

In the one case Judge Bradley said, after the property had been in possession of the purchaser at the bankrupt sale for more than three years, and the fund resulting from it in the coffers of the court, that in consequence of the misdirection of the judge which caused the purchaser to believe that he was taking an estate free from the mortgage, notwithstanding his possession, notwithstanding the advantages resulting from that possession for years, directed absolutely the unqualified and absolute restitution of the purchase money; and if that principle is sound in a case between private parties, why is it not sound in a case between the citizen and his government? Is there any higher or greater equity to be invoked in behalf of the United States when dealing with its own citizens than is applicable in a case between two citizens in one of the highest courts of the land?

There was hardly any doubt in the professional mind with regard to the correctness of Judge Bradley's ruling; and all this talk about caveat emptor has no application here. The distinction is clear, as I said a while ago, that when a sale takes place under an execution which is directed, not against any particular property, but against the estate of the judgment debtor generally, and the sheriff sells, the man who buys at a sale like that takes cum onere whatever may be upon the estate, and he has no right to apply to the court for relief in the event that he fails to get all that he thought he would; but that case is very different from the one before the Senate, where the court in the first instance has its eye upon the particular property, where the execution does not run generally against the estate of the party, but where a special order is directed against a particular portion of the estate of the party, and directs it to be sold discharged of the mortgage lien. Then when it turns out in point of fact that the order is void, and the court had no right to make it, and the Government gets the money, upon what principle, I ask, of law or of morals, can this Government hold on to that fund?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the bill goes over, and the Chair's duty is to lay before the Senate the unfinished business. Before doing so, however, the Chair asks permission to submit some House bills which are on his table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 204) making an appropriation for fuel, lights, water, and so forth, for the fiscal year 1882, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 2315) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. BAYARD. In consideration of the fact that the Senate have already passed a tariff-commission bill, substantially in the terms of the present bill except that the words "internal revenue" do not occur in the House bill as they did in the Senate bill, so that this is the same in substance and will be in its results, I have consulted with members of the Committee on Finance and none of them think it necessary or wise that there should be a reference of the bill to that committee. I therefore ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the House bill as it now stands at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business can be laid aside informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it precisely the same bill?

Mr. HARRIS. This is a House bill. The Senate bill has not been acted on by the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the House bill precisely the same bill as that of the Senate?

Mr. BAYARD. As I understand, they are the same in words with the exception that the Senate bill directed the attention of the commissioners to the subject of the internal revenue as well as the tariff taxation. The House bill has omitted the words "internal revenue," but has committed the subject of tariff taxation to the same commission in the language proposed by the Senate bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Without authority to look into its relations to domestic excise.

Mr. BAYARD. I propose that the Senate shall take up and pass the House bill, the Senate bill not having been acted on by the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I inquire whether this House bill apparently excludes from the consideration of the commission the relations of customs duties to internal revenue? If it does I wish to amend it.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not understand at all that it is possible to exclude from the intelligent consideration of this commission the subject of internal revenue. The amendment was made in the Senate or proposed by the Committee on Finance to the Senate bill, by which the two systems of revenue, excise as well as customs duties, were named; but for my own part, I do not consider it possible that the subject of tariff taxation should be considered by this commission without necessarily including in the purview of the examination the system of internal revenue. I think the broad question of taxation would, without the express direction of considering the question of internal revenue, embrace it; and for that reason, and for the sake I may say of expedition, as the subject of a tariff commission seems to have been agreed upon by both Houses, the sooner the matter passes to the hands of the commission for action the better. We have no time to lose on the subject, and if under the terms of the House bill and under the terms of the Senate bill a report is to be made from time to time during the present session, and by next December a final report, I think it important that the bill should be passed at the earliest day.

For that reason, and believing that the internal-revenue system is so blended in its taxing results with the tariff system that I do not think a tariff commission is strengthened by having an express direction to consider the internal revenue put in it, I trust this House bill will be passed at once.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel it to be a duty to object to any further proceedings in this bill than its first and second reading until to-morrow, so that we can see precisely what the House bill contains.

Mr. BAYARD. Of course it is open to objection, as it requires unanimous consent to consider it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. I was only about to say that there was no use in referring the bill to the Committee on Finance any more. I regard the matter as in the nature of an affidavit for continuance. If a reference prevails it will only last longer. We cannot stop it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is read twice and will be printed.

Mr. BAYARD. And will lie on the table, and I shall call it up to morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It lies on the Calendar of General Orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes to the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the Senator can move to take it up in the regular way.

HUGO EICHHOLTZ.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 5820) granting a pension to Hugo Eichholtz, which has been received from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SLATER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered now. A similar bill in terms was passed by the Senate on a full report from the Committee on Pensions, and I presume was on the House table at the time of the passage of this bill. It has been well considered. The report of the House committee is simply the report of the Senate committee adopted by the House committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senate that one of the clerks has examined the bills and they are exactly alike.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read three times, and passed.

ABAGAIL S. TILTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. No. 108) granting an increase of pension to Abagail S. Tilton, returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 4, after the word "act," to strike out:

Provided, That all payments heretofore made shall be first deducted.

Mr. BLAIR. That is a slight amendment. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That seems to be not a very slight amendment. The Senate bill appeared to provide for applying the money that had been received. Now the House propose that the money already received shall not apply. What does that mean? Will the Senator explain the difference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be objection, the bill with the amendment will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. Let that course be taken; but it is entirely in the interest of the Government that the amendment should be concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions, with the amendment.

PRINTING OF A PENSION DOCUMENT.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 extra copies of Executive Document No. 152, with corrections.

Mr. PLATT. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the document?

Mr. PLATT. It is a document relating to the amount of pensions which have been paid in each State and each Congressional district of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the resolution reported by the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir; and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by the Committee on the Library to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS.]

Mr. JONAS. I propose to accept the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] as the third section of my amendment, if there is no objection, in lieu of the third section as proposed by me. I offer the amendment as amended as the third section of the bill, to come in after the second section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana modifies his amendment as indicated by him. The amendment will be read as modified.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the third section of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the first section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, or in which the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States or a controversy between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, or a controversy between citizens of a State and foreign states, citizens, or subjects; and shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except as otherwise provided by law, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offenses cognizable therein. But no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another in any civil action before a circuit or district court. And no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against any person by any original process or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving such process or commencing such proceeding, except as hereinafter provided; nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon if no assignment had been made. And the circuit courts shall also have appellate jurisdiction from the district courts, under the regulations and restrictions prescribed by law."

That the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts,' approved July 27, 1866," which was approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That the judiciary act, approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, namely: After the first section of said act, insert: "But no city, town, village, county, or other municipal or public corporation shall be sued in the courts of the United States;" and at the end of section 2 of the same act insert: "Private companies or corporations existing and organized in one State, but doing business in another State, if sued in the courts of the latter, shall not have the privilege of removing the case to the United States courts."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS,] as modified, as just read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the vote is taken on this amendment, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are on a subject now not germane to the bill. This amendment of the Senator from Louisiana is introducing a subject foreign to this measure, and which, according to the arguments of the friends of the bill, ought to be left to separate consideration by the Senate. It will be observed that the first and second sections of this bill for the establishment of a court of appeals relate very remotely indeed to the main object of the bill.

The first section provides for the holding of a circuit court in every judicial district of the United States; provides also for the time and place of the commencement of the terms. The section further provides:

And when more than one judge competent to hold such circuit court is present each judge may hold a separate session thereof, in which case the presiding justice or judge shall from time to time designate the causes to be tried or heard before the other judge or judges; and the panel of jurors selected and summoned for the district court shall also be the panel of the circuit court, unless a special order to the contrary be made by one of the judges of said circuit court at least thirty days before the term.

It then makes another change in the law as I understand it.

Every circuit and district judge is empowered to hold a district court in any district within the circuit whenever assigned to that duty by the circuit judge who is senior in office, and two or more judges may hold separate sessions thereof.

The second section provides:

That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise no jurisdiction in cases of appeals or writs of error from the district courts allowed, taken, or sued out after the 1st day of September, 1882, except that reviews in bankruptcy cases, in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction, may be had as heretofore provided.

The second of the sections I have just read is preliminary to the introduction into the bill of the court of appeals. The first section, however, has no direct reference to the court of appeals. It is a modification of the existing judicial system so far as relates to the circuit court, and provides by statute, as I understand has not been heretofore provided, that the judges of the circuit court may hold district courts, and also provides that the circuit courts shall be held in each district, and for the time of the commencement of the sessions, and the district court may be held in separate sessions as the circuit courts may now be. After the introduction of this foreign matter into this bill and much other in the further provisions of it, the argument is not in point that the Senator from Louisiana proposes to put in foreign or new matter by this amendment. The bill itself is in effect substantially an entire revision of the judicial system of the United States, and we insist that when the Senate is revising it in the important particulars indicated in the first and second sections of the bill, we are not out of place or out of order, or in any sense introducing into this bill an inopportune or improper amendment, when we desire to extend those provisions further and to regulate the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States so as to cut down some branches of the jurisdiction now exercised when we consider that they have been ingrafted on the system by judicial construction, and certainly not by any acts of Congress to that effect.

I will not detain the Senate by any further attempt at the argument of the question which has been so ably discussed both by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] and the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] The truth is that in the sense of the bar of the United States, at least those of the profession who are willing that the State courts should be held on to as the forums in which are to be adjudicated the important questions between the people, encroachment has already occurred on the rights of the States and that too much has been done in the direction of conferring power upon the Federal tribunals. The very clog we are complaining of now, beyond all controversy, as a matter of fact has been introduced into our judicial system in virtue of the decisions that have been made assuming jurisdiction over matters which the Congress of the United States never intended these courts should have. I do not know that the people of the United States or their representatives in the Senate and House will ever be brought to the consideration of this question until they shall find that the Federal tribunals have usurped all the judicial power that now belongs to the States and that has heretofore been exercised by them. The march in that direction is so rapid that it amounts to a crusade against the tribunals of the States, and we are left now to consider only and how much of additional jurisdiction we shall take from the State tribunals and confer on the Federal tribunals, and how much and wider opportunity we shall open to men to litigate with each other in the Federal tribunals rather than in the State courts.

I trust that the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana will at least receive the support of every man in this body who desires to put some restriction upon the progressive march of Federal power in the acquisition of new authority to the judiciary of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] Were he present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CALL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] I do not know how he would vote. I should vote "yea," if I were at liberty to vote. If gentlemen on the other side can tell me what his vote would be, I shall know what to do.

Mr. ROLLINS. What is the inquiry?

Mr. CALL. How would the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] vote on this amendment?

Mr. ROLLINS. He would undoubtedly vote "nay."

Mr. CALL. Then I shall not vote.

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] If any Senator in favor of this bill can say that the Senator from Georgia would desire to vote for the amendment, I shall refrain from voting.

Mr. CALL. I have no doubt about it, though I am not authorized to speak for the Senator from Georgia, but I judge that his general views are to that effect.

Mr. FRYE. I am authorized by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] to vote generally on my own judgment. I think I shall refrain from voting in this case.

Mr. BECK, (when Mr. HALE's name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who is necessarily absent from the Senate for a time to-day. He would vote "nay" if here, and I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.] The pair is transferred to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE.] I vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN, (when his name was called.) In the temporary absence of the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY,] I am paired with him. On this question I should vote "nay." I presume he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] on political questions. Not regarding this as political, I vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I voted "yea." I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] I asked his colleague just now whether the pair extended to this bill, and he said that it did not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I saw the Senator [Mr. SAUNDERS] before he left, in the presence of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] and he said it extended to this bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. What was the remark of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am paired with the Senator's colleague generally. He said the Senator present [Mr. VAN WYCK] would tell me whether my pair extended to this amendment offered to this bill.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] informed me before he left that the pair did extend to this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. He so told me.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I did not say to the Senator from Kentucky that I did not understand that the pair would relate to this bill. I could not see really how it ought to be a party question, and my impression was that the Senator was at liberty to vote on the amendment. That is my impression.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under the circumstances, as there seems to be some doubt about it, I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's vote is withdrawn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR,] but my pair has been transferred, so that I can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PUGH. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] I do not know how either of them would vote.

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired on this amendment with the Senator from Louisana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] I desire, however, to put myself on record as in favor of the amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 27; as follows:

Mr. JONAS. I wish to reserve the amendment for a separate vote in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will notify the Senator from Louisiana that it is not in a condition to be reserved, but it may be offered again in the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I move to amend section 3 of the bill by striking out, after the word "thereof," in line 8, the following words:

And two of the district judges, to be designated by an order of the court at each term thereof to serve for the succeeding term, the designation to be made as far as practicable in rotation.

In line 13, substituting "three" for "four," and striking out, in lines 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18, the following words:

In case of the absence of a district judge so designated, another district judge may be designated by the judges then present to serve as long as such absence shall continue.

So as to make that part of the section read:

The said court of appeals shall consist of the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit, and of the circuit judges thereof, any three of whom, including at least one judge competent to preside, shall constitute a quorum. Such justice of the Supreme Court, or, in his absence, the circuit judge present who is senior in office, shall preside. In the absence of a quorum the judge or judges present shall adjourn the court from day to day, or without day.

Mr. President, I feel in common with nearly every member of the legal profession the necessity of doing something to relieve the Supreme Court of the great pressure of business now upon it. I appreciate very greatly the effort of the distinguished Senator who has brought forth this bill, but affecting as it does the interest of every constituency represented in this Chamber it is a matter worthy of the highest reflection.

The bill proposes to create a tribunal made up of district and circuit court judges, investing the tribunal with all the power now possessed by the Supreme Court of the United States. I say that because the bill proposes to give in each circuit of the Union the very power now exercised by the Supreme Court of the United States, for every case involving a sum over $500 must pass through this intermediate tribunal before it can reach the highest court in the land. I was of the impression the other day, after consultation with one of my brother Senators, that a party in a case involving a sum over $10,000 would have under this bill the right of appeal directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, but that——

Mr. BUTLER. If my friend from Florida will permit me, I do not understand that there is to be a right of appeal for any sum under $10,000 from this appellate or intermediate court.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. All cases of appeal under this proposed law must go to the intermediate tribunal, and for all sums over $10,000 an appeal from that tribunal may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. You cannot go directly from the judgment of a circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court of the United States with a case involving $100,000 or $1,000,000, if you wish to do it, under this bill; but you must first submit the controversy to the judges of the intermediate tribunal, and after that tribunal has rendered its judgment the party dissatisfied may take an appeal to the Supreme Court. That is the proposed law unquestionably.

In that view of the case the proposed court of appeals in each circuit becomes what I said a while ago—a tribunal equal in dignity and consequence to the Supreme Court of the United States within each circuit. Then comes up the question, of what material ought that tribunal to be composed? I have some doubt in my mind as to the wisdom of requiring every suitor to go to this tribunal before he can go to the final court of appeal. I think it will be found to involve delay in the collection of honest debts, because whenever a party who makes up his mind to appeal to the intermediate tribunal with a judgment against him in the lower court wants delay he will go to the second court. I am not sure but that it would have been wiser to have given a party a direct appeal from the judgment of the circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court in all cases which involve an amount above $10,000; but I am speaking now of the bill as it is.

Of whom ought the court to be composed which is to be invested with these great powers? The object of my amendment is to have it composed of the circuit judges and one of the justices of the Supreme Court, leaving the district judges where they belong, to discharge the subordinate functions appertaining to their offices. I would be content with that kind of a court of appeals. I do not exaggerate when I say that the circuit judges and the Supreme judge would give in each circuit a court in which the profession and the public would have greater confidence than in a shifting tribunal made up to-day of one set of district judges and another day of another set.

There ought to be permanency to some extent in this proposed establishment. I do not think that it is wise to invest the district judges with the high appellate power proposed by the bill, because I think it is nothing but human nature for such judges after they once taste the exercise of higher authority to be, I will not say absolutely inefficient, but not as capable or as well inclined to perform their other functions as they would be outside of it. That is the tendency of power. I do not believe that with all the learning possessed by the judges of the Supreme Court to-day any of its members are as well qualified to discharge nisi prius duties as those judges who are confined exclusively to that business. If we can get a court composed of circuit court judges and a justice of the Supreme Court, it will I think give more confidence to the people than a tribunal made up of district judges, circuit judges, and a Supreme justice.

The bill proposes to alternate between the district judges, having one set of district judges to sit at one term and another at another. We know that jealousies run throughout human nature, no matter where you find it. There is no position in life so high in which human pride and human jealousy and suspicion may not be found. You would find one set of district judges probably reversing the judgment of their brother district judges, and then another set would come up feeling a little chagrined, it may be, by the action of the judges who preceded them, and thinking that their brother judges are not quite so wise as themselves and that their judgment ought to be reversed.

I do not apply this to a permanent court where all are equal; but this is not a new or untried system. We have had it elsewhere. We tried it once in Florida in the early days. We had some able men on the appellate bench who performed nisi prius duties, and they alternated, and it was not satisfactory to anybody. The men who performed duties on the circuit were required to meet and decide cases of appeal; but it has never given such satisfaction when tried as a permanent supreme court. If we can get a permanent court out of three circuit court judges I would infinitely prefer it to a court made up of five including two district judges. That is the purpose of my amendment.

There is another provision of the bill to which I wish to call attention.

Mr. LAPHAM. Before the gentleman passes from that point will he permit me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. LAPHAM. If you take a judge from the Supreme Court for each of the courts of appeal you will destroy the court here.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The provision is already in the bill putting Supreme judges on the appellate courts in the various circuits. I do not put them there at all by my amendment; I find them here, and I only propose to leave them where I find them; but I would have the appellate court composed of one member of the Supreme Court and the circuit judges.

We know that under existing law the district judges can exercise the powers of circuit judges when the latter are absent, and it might be found very convenient in the administration of justice to take a number of those district judges and all of the circuit judges and put them on this court of appeals. Who are to do the business of the subordinate jurisdictions when this court sits, as it is required to do, twice a year? You take two district judges out of the fifth circuit and you take the three circuit judges, and then you will have to transfer from one circuit to another some of the district judges in order to have the original duties appertaining to the circuit and district courts performed. I think it would be better, and I say this with all deference to the distinguished Senator who has charge of this bill, to leave the district judges where they are and not undertake to elevate them too high, and in this way render them inefficient for the performance of the subordinate nisi prius duties appertaining to their offices.

The other provision of the bill on which I wish to say a word is section 10, which provides:

That the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases be final and conclusive except as otherwise provided in this section, the facts to be specially found if requested by either party.

That applies as well to cases falling exclusively within the jurisdiction of this new court as to cases from which an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. In other words, it proposes to make the judgment of the new court of appeals conclusive upon all questions of fact, including appealable and non-appealable cases. We know very well that in matters of appeal it is very important at times to enable the appellate court to look into the facts of the case, and indeed the facts of the case in nine cases out of ten are of more importance than the law. Lawyers make strange blunders oftentime in wheeling a barrow full of books into the court-room and commencing to read from them without making a statement of the facts of the case to the court. Where a case goes to the Supreme Court under this bill, after once being decided by the court below, under this section the decision of the tribunal below upon the facts is conclusive.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Florida will allow me, I wish to ask him his construction of the language in section 10 of the bill, as to whether it is intended to be conclusive on the Supreme Court, or conclusive on the inferior court when the case is remanded?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I take it to be conclusive on the Supreme Court.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not so stated. It is not stated on what court it is to be conclusive.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is conclusive everywhere. That is the intention of it evidently.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I ask whether the court of appeals is expected to find the facts conclusively where bills of exception are taken?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No, in appeal cases; not upon writs of error.

Mr. MORGAN. Would it then apply to equity causes, admiralty causes, and patent causes?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senate did not agree to that one amendment as to patent causes. Patent causes can go up on law or fact.

Mr. MORGAN. It is intended, then, that the finding of the facts by the appellate court shall be conclusive on the superior court, and shall be conclusive on the inferior court when the case is remanded?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That I understand to be the meaning of the section. I question very much the power of Congress to do that under the Constitution. In cases wherein an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States the Constitution says:

In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to call his attention to the language of section 10. It reads:

That the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases be final and conclusive except as otherwise provided in this section, the facts to be specially found if requested by either party.

That does not confine it to cases coming up by appeal. It says nothing about cases that come up on writ of error; it says "the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases be final and conclusive."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator from Illinois says that is the meaning of it.

Mr. MORGAN. But that is not the reading of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. After the Senator from Florida gets through, I will explain it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think it is clear what it means. It means that when a controversy is before the court of appeals proposed to be created by this bill, and all the facts in the case are found by that court, its judgment upon the facts as distinct from the law shall be final and conclusive, and in a case involving $100,000 or $500,000 which may be appealed to the Supreme Court, when the party reaches the Supreme Court he will not be at liberty to question any finding of the court below with regard to any fact in the case, but he must rely exclusively upon the law as applied to those facts. Oftentimes, as I say, nothing can be more important than correct conclusions in respect to the facts of the case, and tribunals are invested with powers to investigate them with respect to conclusions of fact as they do respecting conclusions of law, and where you open a case for appeal from a subordinate appellate tribunal to another the second tribunal ought to have precisely the same power and authority over the case, both with respect to the law and the fact, that was possessed by the tribunal from which the appeal was taken. If you shut the door with respect to the facts, however erroneous the conclusion of the court below may appear from the record to have been, the reviewing tribunal will be powerless. I say when you give an appeal at all you ought to leave to the reviewing tribunal power to correct matters of fact if correction is to be made in respect to them.

Mr. BUTLER. Or some discretion at least.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Of course when we come to make up ordinary bills of exceptions by writ of error there is seldom any trouble about the facts of the case. The chief controversies arise in cases in equity where the appeal takes up the whole case both as to fact and law; but a bill of exceptions in a case of a writ of error, as we know, usually narrows the controversy down to a few points, and the facts bearing upon those points are generally agreed to by the counsel and certified to by the court. Those cases generally leave but little to dispute about in the appellate tribunal; but in all other cases, in equity causes particularly, the appellate tribunal ought to have full sway over the record both as regards the law and the facts. I do not think that any chancellor or any judge, however great he may be, would be able to do justice in any equity cause unless he could go into all the facts as well as the law of the question.

This section would close the door. It would lighten very greatly, it may be, the labors of the Supreme Court, but I do not suppose that they want to be put out of employment. Indeed they will have plenty to do, I imagine, in any event.

I do not now propose an amendment in this regard; but I propose to draw attention to the phraseology of this section in connection with what I have said in reference to the material out of which I think this important tribunal ought to be composed. The district judges in my section of the country are very good men, very clever men, and I think they would prefer to be left where they are, performing their nisi prius functions rather than to be elevated to the court of appeals sitting side by side with a Supreme judge and taken away from the functions which they were appointed to discharge. If we are going to have a court that will give confidence to the people and to the profession, I would be willing to appoint four circuit court judges rather that two and to have a permanent tribunal and not a shifting one made up of one set of perambulating judges to-day and another set to-morrow. I think this matter is worthy of examination, as all here are interested in the operations of this bill as it deals with the interest of the constituencies represented by everybody on this floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I would prefer a court of five permanent judges if we could get it, but with the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] added to the bill, which provides that the judges who hear a case below cannot participate in the appellate tribunal, it is impossible to have such a court. If the amendment of the Senator from Florida be adopted the court of appeals will consist of three circuit judges and a judge of the Supreme Court. The judge of the Supreme Court is expected to hold the appellate court but very little; he can be there but very little. The judges of the Supreme Court are now authorized to hold circuit courts in the respective circuits of the United States to which they may be assigned, but they are there very little; it is impossible to be there; they cannot do it. Their circuit duties must be necessarily light, because they are required to be here nearly all the time. They are here now six, seven, or eight months every year. At one of the terms of this appellate court a Supreme judge may occasionally be present. At present, in my own region of the country, I know that very few Supreme judges hold any jury trials, simply because they are not able to be there. The court of appeals then would consist of three circuit judges, if you provide that the district judges shall not sit to hold the court. One of these judges could not sit at all, because they are all engaged in the trial of causes, and there would be but two present who would be competent to sit in any one case. You see at once how impracticable that system is.

I am sorry that there is such criticism upon the district judges of this country, as if they were not, as a general thing, competent to hold this court. I do not know the district judges in South Carolina, Alabama, and Florida, except as my friends have talked about them here.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to say that so far as South Carolina is concerned the district judge in that State is a most estimable gentleman. I have not one word to say against him. He is a very pure and upright man.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Then I ought to have said in Florida and Alabama.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to remark that I say nothing against any of the district judges anywhere. It is the principle of which I speak.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg to say that I put upon the record my opinion of at least one district judge in Alabama, and no Senator has yet denied the facts which I stated.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The district judges in the western country are a very able body of men, as able as any circuit judges that will be got under this bill. As a general thing they are able men, conscientious men, prudent men, and learned men. You have to take things as you find them. We are to look for two circuit judges in each circuit in getting these eighteen new judges.

My friend from Florida says he would be willing to have four circuit judges. So would I, but you cannot get them. You cannot get a court of appeals unless you use the district judges for that purpose. I may say conscientiously that in my own country they will be as acceptable as any judges who may be appointed under the bill, should the bill pass, and I believe they would be so in the adjoining circuits, the one going to the Pacific and the one extending down, including Iowa, Arkansas, and all that part of the country. I think the district judges generally would be as acceptable as any circuit judges. When appointed, they are supposed to be very able men. Unfortunately, some were appointed just after the war who are not so acceptable, and I am very sorry for it; but that ought not to be used as an argument to defeat this bill and as an argument against the system.

Objection is made to the rotatory system. In New York the court of appeals for many years consisted of four judges who were permanent and four selected every year from the supreme court of the State, and I never hear any objection to the system on that ground.

It seems to me that since the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, it will be as much as we can do to get along with the bill at all with two judges of the district courts assigned to the court of appeals in each circuit, because that would make a court of four when the supreme judge is absent. If one of these gentlemen has been engaged in the trial of causes, as he will have been most of the time, it will leave but four judges, and if one should get sick, as four is a quorum, they would not have a quorum.

I have thought it best, considering the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, that we should fix the quorum at three instead of four. One judge might be sick, and then they could not hold the court.

In reference to the tenth section, it is very plain what the section means. It means that the court of appeals shall find all the facts in every case. Necessarily where it is a common-law case and goes up by writ of error upon a bill of exceptions, they send it up as they do now in all trial courts, and it goes to the Supreme Court. In admiralty cases, in equity cases, and in patent causes, as the bill stands now, a case can go up without it, unless the bill shall be changed in the Senate.

The great relief to the Supreme Court is to come from the finding of facts by the courts below. By the act of 1875 the Supreme Court was greatly relieved in admiralty and maritime cases, which were, during the time I served on the bench, the most difficult cases to determine, in consequence of the involved facts. Congress said that the court below, the single circuit judge, should find the facts absolutely, and since 1875 no admiralty case has gone to the Supreme Court except upon a question of law. There must be some tribunal, and inasmuch as the court below, the original trial court, and an appellate court has found the facts, we thought that that was enough, and that these judges would be as competent to find the facts as the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Under this bill, after an equity cause goes to the Supreme Court from the intermediate court, would it be considered by the Supreme Court the same as it is now?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No; because as it is now the facts are not found by the court below. It would be considered exactly as an admiralty case is considered at the present time.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I merely wish to say one word in regard to the matter which has been suggested as to the district courts. It seems to me that any person familiar with the legal history of this country will agree that among our very brightest and best judicial reputations have been those of the judges of the United States district courts. The present objection or prejudice and dislike raised against some of those judges in certain sections of the country grow out of a state of things which has now gone by, and which is not likely ever to reappear.

It so happened that the district court was the depository of the judicial authority of the United States so far as it had jurisdiction over crimes and offenses against the United States at a time when by reason of the rebellion a very large number of the ablest and best lawyers in those communities was disqualified naturally from judicial appointment. Many of them were disqualified under the Constitution. In the disturbed condition of things which followed the war the district judge was obliged to uphold the authority of the United States against the very deep feeling existing in the community where his district was situated, and the United States had not the unlimited power of selection of the best men for the reason I have stated. It is only a few months since Congress passed a bill relieving the collector of the port of Savannah, in Georgia, from a defalcation by his subordinate officer on the ground urged by both the Senators from Georgia, and accepted by the Senate, that that collector could not obtain an educated white man in Savannah whom he could appoint to the subordinate office and give charge of his funds, because all of them had just been engaged in the rebellion. The collector made that point and it was urged by the Senators——

Mr. GEORGE. I did not hear what the Senator from Massachusetts said. Will he speak louder?

Mr. HOAR. I was speaking of the peculiar difficulty in obtaining the best and most acceptable legal talent for the district courts of the United States in the disturbed condition immediately after the rebellion. These courts, while they had to uphold and were the sole depositories of the judicial authority of the United States in those disturbed communities, could not, for the reason that the intelligence, the legal ability of those communities had been so largely engaged on one side in the controversy, have that unrestricted power of selection which they had had before the war and would have in ordinary times. I called attention to the fact that the Senate had recently relieved the collector of the port of Savannah from a defalcation shortly after the war, the two Senators from Georgia urging that he could not find in that community an intelligent and educated white man who was in sympathy with the Republican administration, and the collector took, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, a clerk or subordinate from a Northern State, who proved to be a defaulter, and we relieved him against loss. But with the exception of that brief period, I desire to put on record my belief——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question? Do I understand him to say that at this time gentlemen qualified to fill the position cannot be found?

Mr. HOAR. I am not speaking of this time at all. Not that I know of. If the Senator understands me as saying that, he understands me just the contrary of what I say. I was accounting for the prejudice against district courts arising in the disturbed period immediately after the war and saying that that time has gone by, that it never existed before, and it is not likely to reappear again. I did not make the suggestion with the view of casting any blame on those communities or otherwise, but it is the natural course of events; it must have been so in the nature of the case.

I think that on the whole the most enviable judicial fame (I do not think I would even except the judicial fame of Chief-Justice Marshall, great as it is) that has ever adorned the legal annals of this country is that of a judge of the United States district court, Judge Sprague, who died at a great age in the city of Boston within the last few years. The judge of the district court has the administration of prize causes. He administers a system of jurisprudence not like that of a judge of a single State court, not even like that of a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is not confined in its authority to the matters over which the common law prevails, but is a system of jurisprudence as wide as civilization itself, whose authority is recognized by every nation as it rises out of the limits of barbarous nations and begins to have commercial intercourse with other peoples.

That is the law of nations, and it is to be administered and applied to causes of much consequence, to causes in regard to which the passions of man are deeply stirred. The authority of a great judge in prize causes is recognized over the entire civilized world, and his decision will be regarded as a landmark so long as civilization itself endures. The law of nations cannot be much changed except in the few cases where special treaties are made between particular nations. There is no legislative body having power to change it. It depends on those great fundamental principles of morals which underlie all the relations of man with man. The number of judges who have attained great fame in that branch of jurisprudence is necessarily very few—three or four only in England, three or four only in this country, and the same limited number in France, in Holland, and in Italy, I believe; I do not know so much about the latter country.

In time of any great maritime war the fame of this nation, the rights of this nation, its reputation among the jurists of the world, is to be upheld by the judges who sit in the district courts in the great maritime ports of New Orleans, Charleston, Savannah, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Portland; and I think the Senate ought never to do anything which even implies a purpose to degrade or belittle the character of these important tribunals. As I said just now, considering its extent, considering the duty, the character of the legal principles which are to be administered, considering the greatness of the subjects and the interests over which it extends, I would rather have the fame of a great judge in prize causes like that of the late Judge Sprague than any other judicial fame which ever has been won or which ever will be won in this country or in England by any jurist.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to say that I did not intend to cast the least reflection upon any of the district judges of the United States. It was not against the personal qualifications of the men that my argument was directed but the system of having a man one day sitting in a court of appeals and another day at nisi prius. I say that that system has never been a success and it never will be a success. As to the eminence which Judge Sprague well earned in his high office as a judge in prize cases, I question very much whether he would have attained it under a system like this which is proposed. I think that the district judges, if it is possible, ought to be confined to those high duties of which the Senator from Massachusetts has spoken so well.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does he not think that it is the opinion of the profession in all the States of the Union that, if the amount of public business will permit, it is very desirable to have the judges of the supreme law court discharge some nisi prius duties, so that they may be familiar with the profession, familiar with practical affairs, familiar with the course of business in the respective localities?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I know that that is the opinion of some members of the profession possibly. It was Mr. Webster's opinion; indeed, he made a very strong argument once in the other House upon it; but I confess there are a great many who do not concur in it, and who would prefer to see the court of appeals permanently located at the capital, and not have the judges mixing up with the drudgery of the work of the circuit at all, for practically when they go on the circuit they do not do much except to hear a few cases on questions of law, and seldom with a jury. At least, that has been the practice in Florida. I do not know how it has been in other parts of the Union. The business of an appellate tribunal to a great extent unfits them for nisi prius business.

I think if it would be possible to have such a court it ought to be a permanent one, and that the circuit judges ought to hold that court. In saying this I do not mean to reflect in the least upon the district judges, whose time I am very sure will be well taken up in the discharge of their ordinary duties outside of the business proposed to be transacted by this new court of appeals.

The Senator from Illinois says it is not possible, in view of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri and adopted by the Senate, to get a court made up of circuit court judges. I was not here, however, when that amendment was adopted, and am not familiar with its history.

As to what the Senator from Massachusetts says about the district judges distinguishing themselves in prize cases, I sincerely trust that the talent of the district court bench will not have to lie dormant until a great war springs up to bring it into operation, because he very well knows that it is only once in a life-time that it is possible for a prize case to find its way into a district court.

Mr. HOAR. Does not the same remark apply to admiralty very largely?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No.

Mr. HOAR. Considerably?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No; admiralty jurisdiction is one of every-day occurrence throughout the whole country. I do not think any special distinction has ever been won in an admiralty court in this country, because it is a very simple practice. There have been some judges who have attained eminence in it. I think Judge Marvin, of my State, who sat for twenty-five years at Key West, obtained as much distinction in an admiralty court as any district judge in this country ever obtained, and justly so.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. And Judge Ware.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Judge Ware did, too; he was a very able judge.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Judge Ware was equal to anybody.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. But outside of admiralty there is not much left for the district judge to do except what he does when holding the circuit courts. I have often wondered why some step had not been taken to do away altogether with the distinction now existing between the circuit and district courts, and why they should not all fall under circuit court jurisdiction. It is only a refinement in reality. It was established when it was the custom in former days for the supreme judge to go down and sit with the district judge on the circuit, in point of fact, and perform some substantial duty, which is very seldom done now. In the early history of the Government, when the acts of 1789 and of 1792 went into operation, the supreme judges were in the habit of going regularly on the circuit and performing their full part of the circuit court work. Then there were circuit courts and there were district courts formed; and in the absence of the judge of the Supreme Court the district judge of course was confined to his ordinary jurisdiction; but since that everything has been changed, and we have now circuit courts independent of the Supreme Court judge, with judges appointed to preside over them whose duties are confined to their circuits. It would be just as well, in my opinion, if the two jurisdictions were resolved into one for all substantial purposes, but that is not a question arising under this bill.

What I said a while ago in regard to the tenth section is a matter of very great importance. The Senator from Illinois has stated that an equity cause under this section, if it becomes a law, cannot be heard in the Supreme Court as it is heard to-day. I am sure that I do not exaggerate when I say that in equity cases nothing is more important than to have the court above to stand as near as possible in the shoes of the court below. It is not like a case at law altogether, for an appeal in equity, according to the English practice to-day and according to the practice now prevailing in our courts, opens up the whole case to the court above. It does so even in the English House of Lords in an equity cause, in the highest court of equity in the British Empire.

When a case goes up on appeal to the House of Lords in Great Britain, where a case can be gotten up, that appeal opens up, according to the principles of equity, the whole case, and the court above is not confined to any special findings of fact by the inferior tribunal. This section undertakes to tie the hands of the court above right in the face of the provision of the Constitution, which in my judgment does not allow this thing to be done, because the Constitution declares in the clearest possible terms that—

In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

The power here given to create exceptions and to prescribe regulations applies equally to the law as to the facts, and you may as well undertake to exclude the Supreme Court from taking cognizance of questions of law where it has appellate power at all as to exclude it from considering the fact in equity causes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It does not exclude it. They find the facts.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. They find the facts, but we know that the great majority of controversies in equity sometimes grow out of dispute with respect to the facts, when there is very little or no disagreement in regard to the law. I have known some of the most important controversies in equity that were ever decided to turn upon disputes with regard to the facts of the case which the chancellor had to decide, while there was little or no dispute whatever in regard to the law applicable to those facts, if the facts themselves could be ascertained.

I say it is an elementary principle of equity jurisprudence, both in England and in this country, that an appeal opens up the whole case, both as to the law and the fact.

Why should not that principle be retained? What sort of hardship is it for the Supreme Court of the United States in a case which involves a sum exceeding $10,000, in equity, to review the whole record as it does now? The counsel of course are required in their briefs to give the court an outline of the controversy, to state the important facts involved; and the labor of investigating facts I do not think is very great. I do not think it is wise or expedient to cut off from the Supreme Court in equity causes all authority to look into the facts of the case and to make the judgments of this new court of appeals absolutely conclusive with respect to those facts, leaving nothing but the mere law of the case, which in many instances may be comparatively unimportant, the only question for the court above to decide. That seems to be the object of this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES?]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the tenth section of the bill by striking out the words:

That the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases be final and conclusive except as otherwise provided in this section, the facts to be specially found if requested by either party; but.

So as to read:

A review upon the law may be had upon writ of error or appeal in the manner now provided by law to the Supreme Court of the United States from every final judgment or decree of the court of appeals, where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $10,000, exclusive of costs, or where the adjudication involves a question upon the construction of the Constitution or the construction or the validity of a treaty or a law of the United States, or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

I predicate this motion upon the idea suggested by the Senator from Florida, that the Constitution of the United States requires that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction upon appeal of questions of fact as well as questions of law, and that we are violating the Constitution when we undertake to take from that tribunal this constitutional function. I cannot read the Constitution otherwise than as it was interpreted by the Senator from Florida:

In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

That brings up the question whether Congress can make an exception of a part of its jurisdiction conferred upon the Supreme Court, that is to say that it shall have the jurisdiction upon appeal of questions of law and not of questions of fact. If you can do that you can say also that it shall have jurisdiction upon appeal of questions of fact but not of questions of law. If you can regulate it in one particular you can in the other. I regard that language as a substantive grant of appellate power to the Supreme Court, defining in the grant what the power is or the subjects which it includes, that it includes the appellate power as to questions of law and questions of fact.

The Senator from Florida illustrated this by some examples, I believe that came under his own observation where it became extremely important that the Supreme Court should become the judges of the facts of the case as well as of the law, because we know that it is a matter of impossibility for a court to make an intelligent decision upon any case until it has first ascertained what the facts are. The Supreme Court has the right under the Constitution to ascertain what are the facts in the case when it is brought up by appeal, and we have no right to delegate that power of the Supreme Court to an inferior tribunal. We might just as well say that the district court shall finally ascertain and find the facts, or that the circuit court shall ascertain and find the facts, and that the court of appeals and the Supreme Court shall both be excluded from any power of contradicting the facts as found by the district or circuit court. If we commence to break down the constitutional authority of the Supreme Court, there is no end to our enterprise except our own will, our own fancy. It seems to me that we are striking at one of the most important and essential elements of the appellate power of the Supreme Court thus guaranteed in the Constitution when we adopt the part of the bill which I have moved to strike out.

This part of the bill, however, is amenable to another objection which I propose to amend. The Senator from Illinois said in answer to a question I asked him while he was on his feet before, that he construed this provision of the tenth section as including the right of the court of appeals to decide upon questions of fact so as to conclude the Supreme Court and also so as to conclude the inferior court, the court from which the error or appeal was taken. I do not understand that that is the position of the members of the committee upon this question. I think I can venture to say that some members of the committee at least consider this language to mean that the court of appeals is to find the facts so as to make them conclusive only upon the Supreme Court and not upon the inferior court when the cause shall be remanded to the inferior court either by the action of the Supreme Court or the intermediate court of appeals. The Senator from Illinois, however, places a different construction upon it.

If we find the members of the committee themselves differing as to the construction of this language in the proposed statute, it certainly behooves us that we should make it plain by such amendments as will leave no doubt or controversy about the meaning. But the language of this provision is as broad as the English language can make it. There is no reservation and no qualification of any kind whatever. It is not made to apply to cases brought up on appeal; it may apply as well to cases brought up on error. It is not made to apply to civil causes; it may apply also to criminal causes.

A man is condemned to death in the circuit court of the United States. He brings a writ of error upon a bill of exceptions, or upon the record either, into the court of appeals. The court of appeals pronounces the facts as they are presented in that bill of exceptions, and according to the language of this section the decision upon the facts in that court of appeals is conclusive against that man when the cause goes back again, thereby depriving the jury when the case shall return to the inferior court of the right to pass upon the facts; for, says the bill, "the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases be final and conclusive, except as otherwise provided in this section." There is no other provision in the section which modifies or in any way qualifies this language in the particulars to which I have referred.

Shall we enact a law in the face of the Constitution that will give to the intermediate court of appeals the power to determine the facts conclusively in a criminal cause, so that when the case gets back to the inferior court that court shall have nothing to do but to submit those facts to the jury as facts found by the appellate court? It may be said that is not the intention of the section. If it be not the intention of it, put in words that will express the intention. This language certainly does not express a different intention. On the contrary it is a broad, sweeping assertion that every fact found by a court of appeals shall be conclusive in the case, whether it goes to the superior court or whether it is remanded to the inferior court.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to my friend whether it may not be entirely against the weight of the testimony.

Mr. MORGAN. It makes no difference whether it is against the weight of the testimony or not; it is the taking in a criminal cause, from the only tribunal that has a right to find the facts, their jurisdiction and making it to depend upon the judgment of an appellate court as to what the facts shall be after the cause goes back to the inferior court.

If this section is intended to apply only to cases in admiralty, or equity, or to patent causes, then let the section be so expressed. Let it not be said that in cases of appeal from the district or circuit courts of the United States the decisions of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases be final. I contend that even that language would violate the Constitution when you undertook to apply it to the Supreme Court, but clearly the language of the section conveys a very much broader meaning than the honorable Senator from Illinois intended, according to the course of his argument, that it should convey.

In legislating upon matters so important as this it is of the first necessity that we should make our enactments so entirely plain as to remove as far as we possibly can all doubt and all construction; but I submit it to every Senator on this floor, I submit it to the honorable Senator from Illinois himself, that on the reading of this section it will be held, or might be held, just as well as any way that the finding of the intermediate court of appeals upon a question of fact, when the fact came up by writ of error, it makes no difference how, should be conclusive upon the court below as well as upon the Supreme Court when the case might be sent there upon a writ of error or upon an appeal.

I do not doubt what the meaning of the honorable Senator from Illinois is. It is that in appeal causes brought from the district and circuit courts the finding upon the facts by the intermediate court of appeals shall be conclusive upon the Supreme Court, not upon the inferior court when the case shall be again remanded to that court; but here we have language which is too broad to convey that signification only. The language is capable of being interpreted so as to convey the signification that it applies to all cases. Indeed, the language of this proposed statute is affirmative on that subject, for it says that in all cases the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall be final and conclusive.

I therefore have moved to strike out so much of the section as I have indicated, upon the constitutional ground that we have no right to abridge the power of the Supreme Court of the United States when a case comes there upon a writ of error so as to say to them, "You shall not be the judge in the facts in this case."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The interpretation given to this provision by the Senator from Alabama is not any broader than the language warrants, and it does seem to me that it ought to be confined within something like reasonable limits. It applies to all cases. I never knew of a court of appeals before empowered to find facts in any case of any description. It is not really the function of a court of appeals to find facts. It is always the province of a court of original jurisdiction to find facts when it can do so through the medium of a jury. That has been the usual course and custom. The Constitution attached so much consequence to findings of fact that it declared in the seventh amendment that—

> No fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

This is not according to the course of the common law at all, but a court for the first time is empowered to find the facts in a case originating in another tribunal. It seems to me that if there is to be any finding of facts in a controversy, whether criminal, civil, or equitable, the finding ought to take place below, in the court where the controversy is begun, where the witnesses are near, where there is a better opportunity of getting at the truth, because oftentimes when a record is made up and goes into a court of appeals some corrections may be made, some explanations may be given; but this provision in the bill closes forever the door in any particular suit, and says when the court of appeals shall find the facts that is the end of the controversy so far as those facts are concerned, and that it will not ever afterward be in the power of either the court below or the Supreme Court of the United States to look into the facts of the case. Is it wise to do that? That is the meaning of this provision.

The Senator from Illinois says it closes the door on every side, and when the intermediate court of appeals finds the facts in any case, that is an end of it; there is to be no further investigation. How is that court to find the facts? It has not the power to examine witnesses, it is not contended that any court of appeals will examine witnesses. It can only find those facts from a review of the case as presented by the record on appeal, so that if a witness swore to a falsehood in the original trial or was bribed and made a false statement in consequence of it, and the court of appeals found its conclusion upon his first statement, it would not have authority to correct it after the court had arrived at its conclusions of facts in the first record.

It may be said that this is putting an extreme case, but it is not. I say it is wiser to leave the law as it is. The Senator from Illinois has admitted that under this provision of the bill it will not be possible to try an equity cause in the Supreme Court of the United States as we try it to-day, because that tribunal will be bound down by the findings of this intermediate court with respect to the facts, in the very teeth of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that when the Supreme Court exercises jurisdiction by appeal that jurisdiction shall attach to the facts as well as the law. I ask the honorable Senator from Illinois how he gets around the Constitution when it declares that the appellate jurisdiction shall extend both to the law and to the fact?

Take a case involving $10,500 in equity. An appeal is taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. This intermediate court decides the facts and it sets out its conclusions. The suitor comes to Washington and says, "The court below rendered an erroneous judgment respecting these facts, and I want this court to review them;" but the court says, "This law cuts you off; the finding of the court below is conclusive." However, the Constitution says that the Supreme Court shall decide it; that it shall have the same power over the fact, where you give it authority at all, that it has over the law. You cannot close the door of the Supreme Court of the United States to the suitor by a provision of this kind and say that this tribunal shall not have full authority to investigate the facts in a controversy the same as the law, according to the usages and customs prevailing in appeal cases.

Let me say that this principle does not apply in equity causes; but it applies particularly to admiralty cases and prize cases. In all that class of causes which are decided according to the course of the civil law the fact and the law go together side by side. Of course when it comes to the strictness of the common law as administered at Westminster Hall a different rule prevails. A bill of exceptions is made up, and there is very little dispute at times respecting the facts, because the seal of the judge to the bill of exceptions is presumed to settle the facts in controversy, and it goes to the higher court; but that principle does not prevail in respect to controversies in equity or in admiralty.

As I said a while ago, some of the hottest controversies I have ever known in cases of that kind arose out of disputes with respect to the facts of the case.

Take the case of a collision on the high seas; take the case of the stranding of a ship, involving questions of insurance money. The most difficult and protracted lawsuit I was ever engaged in in my life grew out of a contest about the facts of a case, that is, with respect to the circumstances under which a ship went ashore on the reefs of Florida. There was no law involved in the case, it was all in regard to whether the captain in point of fact stranded the ship in fraud of the underwriters. The case went to every court in my State, and finally to New York, and upon those facts turned the entire controversy in the case. There are thousands of cases of which that is true. This bill proposes in a case which may involve $100,000 to cut off the appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States, and practically to give conclusive power of judgment to this intermediate court of appeals. Now, I say that is not wise nor is it in keeping with the Constitution; and whenever a suitor comes to the Supreme Court of the United States with a case in admiralty or in equity he ought to be permitted under the organic law to have that case investigated, both with respect to the law and the facts, and the judgment of this intermediate court of appeals on the facts ought not to be conclusive, and under the organic law I contend it cannot be made conclusive against the right of appeal.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida over and over again repeats the argument that this provision is contrary to the Constitution of the United States. I should not speak at all were it not for that assertion. The construction of the Supreme Court is that the Supreme Court are the judges of the law and the facts, but the Congress of the United States can tell how the facts shall reach that court. It did it in admiralty cases in 1875. The Senator talks about an admiralty case that he was concerned in being brought up on a question of fact where $100,000 and over was involved. Plenty of those cases involve half a million dollars; and yet the Supreme Court now do not find the facts in such cases; the facts are presented, and they judge of the law and the facts. Congress has said that the circuit judges shall find the facts in all questions of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will he not admit that an appeal in equity to-day to the Supreme Court brings up the whole case?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Of course an appeal in equity does; but an appeal in admiralty does not; and half the Senator's speech was to prove that in admiralty cases the facts ought not to be found by the court below. There is no difference between an admiralty appeal and an equity appeal. An admiralty appeal is more based on facts than an equity appeal as a general thing, because the admiralty law is simpler and can be easier applied than the principles of equity, but the facts go before the Supreme Court as Congress shall determine, and the facts in admiralty cases go there now by the finding of a circuit judge. In these cases there are to be two findings: there are findings in the original trial jurisdiction and then findings in the court of appeals. The Supreme Court has stated that the facts can be presented in any manner that Congress may determine, and Congress does determine, if it passes this bill, that these facts are to go there from the findings of this intermediate tribunal, and the tenth section is of the utmost importance in the bill. The great relief to the Supreme Court, or one of the great sources of relief, is from the finding of facts by the court below; and if I were a suitor and honestly believed I ought to win, I would rather have the facts found by an appellate tribunal whose business it was to find specially the facts, as this bill says they shall on the request of either party, than to have the case go to the Supreme Court without any finding of facts from the court below.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the discussion on both sides. There is one view, however, which has not been presented that I should like to have answered by the Senator from Illinois, and that is this: the Constitution declares that there shall be "one Supreme Court." This bill declares that there shall be another Supreme Court as to the facts. I understand the word "supreme" to indicate the highest and the last judicial power which can be exercised with reference to a lawsuit. I should like to know how this provision can be made to consist with that provision of the Constitution which declares for the oneness of the Supreme Court. It appears to me that by this provision of the bill we have two supreme courts, both appellate: one supreme as to the facts, the other supreme as to the law; and that appears to me to be so plain that it cannot be met by any argument. It certainly is not met by the argument of the distinguished Senator from Illinois when he says that the Supreme Court are, under this bill, to be the judges of the facts as well as of the law, but, as he admitted, they will be obliged to take the facts as they are found by the court of appeals.

Now, Mr. President, that seems to me to be an invasion of the Constitution. What judicial function, I will ask the Senator from Illinois, does the Supreme Court exercise with reference to the facts of a case which have been found, and, according to the language of this bill, found conclusively by another tribunal? It accepts the facts as thus found, and it makes no judgment concerning them.

The Constitution has declared what kind of a Supreme Court we shall have. It has not left that to inference. It has declared, in the first place, that it shall be a unit; that it shall be one; that it shall not be two; and, in the next place, it has declared that the jurisdiction of this court shall as well extend to the facts as to the law. Now, if this bill passes and this appellate court is established, what do we do in this country? We have nine appellate courts instead of one who are supreme as to the facts; we have one Supreme Court which is supreme as to the law; that is, it has just one-half of the jurisdiction which the Constitution says it should have. How can this be made to stand with the Constitution upon that subject? I would like to have it explained how nine supreme courts, supreme as to the facts, and one Supreme Court, supreme only as to the law, can consist with the constitutional rule that there shall be one Supreme Court which shall have jurisdiction both as to the law and the fact?

And, sir, I desire to make another remark in support of the views presented by the Senator from Florida, and that is this: the finding of the facts in a case is just as important, just as essential, if not more so, to the right determination of a cause as the finding of the law; and the party who complains that the facts have been found improperly against him has just as much right to have that finding reviewed by the highest tribunal as the party who complains only of a mistake of the law. In my little experience in professional life, I have had less cause to complain of errors in the enunciation of mere abstract rules of law than I have of errors of fact. In other words, it is a very easy matter to enunciate abstract rules of law which are correct, and yet a very difficult matter frequently to find the facts and apply them to that rule of law.

This provision, as I have before remarked, and as was well urged by the Senator from Florida, deprives the Supreme Court of one of its most important functions: to ascertain what the facts are; and unless I can have a better reason than has yet been given for this elimination from the constitutional powers of the Supreme Court of a most important function I shall be compelled to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CALL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH, (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called.) The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] is paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 32; as follows:

Mr. MORGAN. In section 10, line 2, after the word "cases," I move to insert "of appeal to the Supreme Court;" so as to read:

That the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall in all cases of appeal to the Supreme Court be final and conclusive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the doors are closed, I wish to say that I am directed by the Committee on Finance to ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. No. 1604) to establish an assay office at Deadwood, in the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any public necessity for that?

Mr. MORRILL. There is a necessity for it in order to have it pass the other House.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to it. Has it been reported from a committee?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes; and I was directed to ask for its present consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. It can come up to-morrow just as well.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seventeen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty minutes, p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 8, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

SALARIES OF SENATE AND HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire now to ask unanimous consent to present for consideration at this time the resolution to which my friend from Pennsylvania objected on Saturday, for the reason that it interfered with the tariff-commission bill. That being out of the way, I presume there will be no further objection to considering the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be in order when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the ensuing fiscal year is under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to submit amendments to said bill looking to an equalization of salaries of the employés of the House with those of the Senate.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me to say a word?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to say, so far as my judgment goes, that while I am in favor of paying adequate salaries, the difficulty is that the House has too many employés.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that while this equalization may increase some salaries, it will decrease others.

Mr. RANDALL. I am perfectly aware——

Mr. HISCOCK. If this resolution is going to lead to any further discussion I must object to it——

Mr. RANDALL. I am aware that the Senate——

Mr. HISCOCK. And demand the regular order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reason I object is, that I believe some rule will be reported by which the individual measures of gentlemen can be reached; and I believe it is desirable as soon as we can to get to the consideration of the special order, as I shall soon be able to report the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Regular order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This will take but a moment. I hope it will not be objected to now.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted upon by the gentleman from Kentucky.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to withhold the call for the regular order for a moment to allow me to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 613) in relation to the Presidential count be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Law respecting Election of President and Vice-President.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the call of States been concluded?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to offer a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, if the House will allow me to do so, that this resolution simply directs the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to inquire into the propriety of purchasing a certain lot in this city upon which is situated the house in which Abraham Lincoln, then President of the United States, died; and I trust there will be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order of business, and in making that call for the regular order of business I do not deal with individuals or subjects. The business of the House ought to be proceeded with in order.

Mr. FISHER. I was not in when my State was called, and I hope there will be no objection to my introducing a bill for reference only.

The SPEAKER. There are several gentlemen who were not present when their States were called, and if there is no objection they will be recognized for the introduction of bills for reference only.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that call, and I think he will not when he hears the object I have in view.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to call for the regular order every minute.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentleman will hear me. The late Admiral Rodgers——

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot distinguish between individuals or subjects.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is under the resolution of the House of April 24, which will be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Monday, May 8, 1882, after the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions, is hereby set aside for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. URNER. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to present for adoption at this time the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Monday the 22d day of May, instant, after the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions, be, and the same is hereby, set apart for the consideration of such business as the Committee on the District of Columbia may present for the consideration of the House.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting "business relating to the Territories of the United States." There are eight Territories, Mr. Speaker, which, to be sure, have local governments, but which nevertheless are largely depending on Congressional legislation to make things work smoothly. In matters relating to the reduction of reservations, the opening of public lands, and others equally important we have to depend on Congress. On account of the immense mass of business on the calendars our measures cannot receive consideration, although there would be no objection raised if they could be considered. Matters pertaining to the reapportionment of our Legislatures and others necessary to working of our local governments are now pending. I hope a day may be set apart for the business of the Territories.

Mr. URNER. I hope the gentleman will offer a separate resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not germane to the pending resolution.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is not germane to the pending resolution and I make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the amendment is in order. The resolution of the gentleman from Maryland would not be in order except for the prior order of the House setting apart this day for the consideration of District of Columbia business. To be in order the amendment must relate to such business as comes from that committee. The amendment is not in order.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. URNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the District of Columbia does not indicate any further business.

Mr. URNER. I am instructed by the committee to say that we will not present any further business to-day. It is the desire of the chairman of the committee, as well as the greater number of the members of the committee, to attend the funeral of Major Twining, and consequently we will have no further business to present to-day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANDERSON. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds having voted therefor.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. ANDERSON. In accordance with the notice which I gave on Saturday last, I now call up the bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture. This is the special order previously made by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by resolution of the House on the 1st of March last the bill to which the gentleman refers was made a special order. The gentleman from Kansas now calls up the special order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire of the gentleman who has charge of the bill when he expects to call a vote on the bill and the amendments?

Mr. ANDERSON. In reply to the gentleman from New York I will say that several gentlemen have indicated a desire to be heard on this question, but if a session can be given to the committee to-night for debate, I am in hopes we can reach a vote some time to-morrow.

Mr. REAGAN. What is the bill to which the gentleman refers?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Department of Agriculture, established at the seat of government of the United States, shall be an Executive Department, under the supervision and control of a secretary of agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include such department, and the provisions of title 4 of the Revised Statutes are hereby made applicable to said department.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in said department an assistant secretary of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, and the several chiefs of the bureaus hereinafter named, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of four years, who shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the secretary.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of collecting and disseminating all important and useful information concerning agriculture, and also concerning such scientific matters and industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture, the secretary shall organize the following bureaus, namely:

First. The bureau of agricultural products, which shall include divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry, and the chief of which bureau, who shall be a practical agriculturist, shall investigate the modes of farming in the several States and Territories, and shall report such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farmer respecting the various methods; the crops most profitable in the several sections; the preferable varieties of seeds, vines, plants, and fruits; fertilizers; implements; buildings; and similar matters.

Second. The bureau of animal industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States; their protection, growth, and use; the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases; and the kinds, races, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

Third. The bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, and so forth, are hereby transferred to the Department of Agriculture. And the Secretary may, through said bureau, institute such investigations and collect such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States as may be deemed of value and importance.

Fourth. The bureau of statistics, the chief of which shall collect and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to labor and wages in this and other countries; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau, and to make such monthly or other reports, as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers or other industrialists of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the secretary of agriculture shall hereafter receive the same salary as is paid to the Secretary of each of the Executive Departments; the salary of the assistant secretary of agriculture shall be the same as that paid to the Assistant Secretary of the Department of the Interior; and the salary of a chief of bureau shall be the same as that paid to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

SEC. 5. That all laws and parts of laws relating to the Department of Agriculture now in existence, as far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, and only so far, are continued in full force and effect.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire, inasmuch as I do not see the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] here, to ask that his proposed substitute for this bill be read.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to know whether the points of order against this bill have been reserved, or whether the House is now to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no recollection that the points of order were reserved upon the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Then, I make the point of order now, that this should be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. This is a very important measure.

Mr. ANDERSON. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will say that this bill has been already made a special order for consideration to-day, and I think the point as to its being considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was thereby waived.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not wish the gentleman from Kansas to understand that I am opposing the bill because I make that suggestion. I do it because it only seems proper that a bill of this importance should receive its consideration under the rules of the House.

Mr. BRIGGS. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom was referred a bill of a similar character, have offered a substitute for this bill, which has been ordered to be printed, and is now, I believe, at the Printing Office. The gentleman from Michigan, who has the bill in charge, [Mr. HUBBELL,] will probably be able to state when we can get copies of that proposed substitute.

The SPEAKER. That bill to which the gentleman from New Hampshire refers, as the Chair recollects, was offered as a proposed substitute, and was ordered to be printed and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Kansas in charge of the bill will agree that it is to be debated in the House and considered as in Committee of the Whole, I think there can be no objection to that course, and I shall not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. HUBBELL. I was directed by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to report a bill as a substitute for the pending bill, which proposed substitute I introduced on Saturday, and it was printed and recommitted to the committee. My desire is, under instructions from the committee, to which I have referred, to offer the bill prepared by that committee as a substitute for the pending bill as soon as it comes from the Printing Office. I am informed that it will be here in a few moments.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask unanimous consent that all the bills intended as substitutes for the bill of the Committee on Agriculture may be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow morning; and, also, as far as practicable, all proposed amendments to the bills, so that we may see what they are.

Mr. REAGAN. I request that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia may be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Nebraska that proposed substitutes and amendments to be offered to the pending bill be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow morning?

Mr. HUBBELL. I object for a moment, for the purpose of making an explanation. I wish it to be understood that the mere fact of offering and printing in the RECORD shall not be considered as making them in order as substitutes for or amendments to the pending bill. Let it be understood that amendments which are properly in order may be considered when moved as amendments during the consideration of the bill in the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. They would not necessarily be in order until the proper time comes for offering them.

Mr. HUBBELL. What, then, is the use of printing them in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, the proposition is to print them in the RECORD for information.

Mr. HUBBELL. I withdraw the objection. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I renew the objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not wish the substitute to which I have called attention to lose its place during this colloquy.

The SPEAKER. At the proper time the amendment or substitute to which the gentleman refers will be in order.

Mr. HUBBELL. I have withdrawn the objection to printing in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, as the Chair understands, has renewed it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No, I withdraw the objection. I made it under a misapprehension. I desired only to have the understanding that we shall not be barred of our right to introduce amendments when the bill is up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. Certainly not. Objection having been withdrawn, amendments and proposed substitutes for the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REAGAN. Let them be printed in the order in which they are presented.

The following is the proposed substitute offered by Mr. KENNA:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be at the seat of Government an executive department to be known as the department of industries, and a secretary of industries, who shall be the head thereof.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of agriculture, and to superintend said division a commissioner of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, and who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be entitled to receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of collecting and disseminating all important and useful information concerning agriculture, and also concerning such scientific matters and industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture, the secretary of industries shall organize the following bureaus in the division of agriculture, namely:

First. The bureau of agricultural products, which shall include divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry, and the chief of which bureau, who shall be a practical agriculturist, shall investigate the modes of farming in the several States and Territories, and shall report such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farmer respecting the various methods, the crops most profitable in the several sections, the preferable varieties of seeds, vines, plants, and fruits, fertilizers, implements, buildings, and similar matters.

Second. The bureau of animal industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States; their protection, growth, and use; the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases, and the kinds, races, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

Third. The bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, &c., are hereby transferred to the department of industries. And the secretary of industries shall institute such investigations and collect and report such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States, and facilities for their ventilation and general operation, as may be deemed of value and importance.

SEC. 4. That in addition to the duties imposed by chapter 10, title 7, of the Revised Statutes, the secretary of industries shall cause to be collected and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to labor and demands and prices therefor in this and other countries; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, cost of transportation, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau and to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers, miners, mechanics, laborers, or other industrialists of the United States.

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of commerce, and to superintend said division a commissioner of commerce, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 6. That all divisions and subdivisions, bureaus or parts thereof, heretofore attaching to the Treasury Department by virtue of the provisions of chapter 10 of title 7 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Bureau of Statistics, which shall hereafter be known as the bureau of external commerce; title 48, relating to commerce and navigation; title 49, relating to the regulation of vessels in foreign commerce; title 50, relating to the regulation of vessels in domestic commerce; title 52, relating to the regulation of steam-vessels; title 56, relating to the coast survey; title 55, relating to lights and buoys; sections 4891, 4892, 4893, 4894, 4895, and 4896 of chapter 1, title 59, relating to hospital relief for seamen; and chapter 265 of the acts of the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, relating to the Life-Saving Service, or by virtue of any law amendatory of said several provisions or regulations in pursuance thereof, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be parts of the division of commerce in the department of industries; and the secretary of industries shall establish in said division of commerce a bureau of internal commerce, to be organized and governed as other bureaus in said division.

SEC. 7. That all duties devolving upon the Secretary of the Treasury by virtue of the several provisions mentioned in the preceding section shall, from and after the passage of this act, be performed by the secretary of industries. The authority conferred and the duties imposed by said several provisions upon the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be exercised and discharged by the commissioner of commerce. All bonds authorized by any of the provisions aforesaid to be made payable to the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be made payable to the commissioner of commerce.

SEC. 8. That section 158, title 4, of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the words: "Eighth. The department of industries."

SEC. 9. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with the present organization of the various departments, divisions, subdivisions, and bureaus embraced herein, except with reference to the transfer thereof to the department of industries, subject to the general provisions of law relating to regulations in the various Departments of the Government and appointments to office therein.

SEC. 10. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The following is the proposed substitute reported by Mr. HUBBELL, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Department of Agriculture, now established at the seat of Government of the United States, shall hereafter be an executive department, and the Commissioner thereof shall hereafter be known as the secretary of agriculture; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include said department by adding at the end thereof the words: "Eighth. The Department of Agriculture," which shall hereafter be the title of said department.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in the Department of Agriculture a secretary and an assistant secretary of agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and such secretary shall receive the same compensation as is now paid to the heads of the other Departments of the Government, and such assistant secretary shall receive a compensation of $4,000 per annum, each to be paid monthly; and a chief clerk of said department, to be appointed by the head thereof, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, to be paid monthly.

SEC. 3. That in addition to the duties now performed by the statistician of the Department of Agriculture, provided in section 529, title 22, of the Revised Statutes, it is hereby made the further duty of said statistician to collect all facts, information, and statistics obtainable relative to the annual product of manufactures and the cost thereof, the various processes employed, the quantity and value of raw materials consumed, and such other information as shall show each year the condition of manufactures in the several States. It shall also be the further duty of the said statistician to collect all facts relating to the wages of labor, hours of labor, and the general condition of the laboring classes throughout the country.

SEC. 4. That the secretary of said department is hereby authorized to call upon the chief of the Bureau of Statistics, now organized under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, for all information collected by that bureau relating to the railroad systems of the country and the cost of constructing and operating the same, or such other information as is contemplated in paragraph 129 of the supplement to the Revised Statutes; and it is hereby made the duty of the head of said Bureau of Statistics to furnish the said information whenever called for by the said secretary of agriculture.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the secretary of said department of agriculture to organize therein a bureau of mining industry, for the collection by appropriate means of such facts and information as directly relate to the utilization of waste and other products, to geology, and to the geological surveys of the United States; and such other subjects as in the opinion of the secretary more especially belong to that bureau shall be assigned to the said bureau of mining industry; and all powers and duties vested in the commission known as the Geological Survey, together with all officers, clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, and other property thereof, are hereby transferred to the said department of agriculture.

SEC. 6. That the secretary of agriculture shall organize in said department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof who shall be a competent and experienced veterinary surgeon, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $2,500 per annum, to be paid monthly. There shall be collected through said bureau all facts, statistics, and information relative to the number, value, and condition of all domestic animals, the existence of all infectious or contagious diseases to which they are severally subject, and experiments with remedies and preventives for the same, and such other information as shall be valuable to the agricultural or commercial interests of the country.

SEC. 7. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the foregoing are hereby repealed.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess this evening, for the purpose of debate on this bill, from five o'clock to half past seven.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to know if unanimous consent has been given that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. That would be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. No such proposition has yet been submitted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that that order be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, I desire to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if he will not now give notice when he will call the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to any time being fixed for calling the previous question.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Kansas can give notice and the gentleman from Illinois cannot object to that.

Mr. ANDERSON. In view of the fact that there will be an evening session for debate, I give notice I will call the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Do not give any notice now.

Mr. ANDERSON. I give notice that I shall ask that general debate be closed at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ANDERSON. That will allow debate on amendments after general debate has been closed.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Kansas for a moment. I do not know how much debate will be desired on this bill; but it occurs to me after the session of to-night the gentleman from Kansas can then better determine when he will call the previous question. After seeing the progress of the debate he may be willing to allow an hour or two longer for general debate. It seems to me the gentleman will be in a better position to-morrow morning to say when he will call the previous question without causing antagonisms in the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. If after the session to-night it is seen that general debate can be closed at two o'clock to-morrow, I shall make that request.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand the gentleman gives notice now that he will move to close general debate at two o'clock to-morrow.

CORRECTION.

Mr. ATHERTON. I desire to make a correction of the RECORD. My colleague, [Mr. CONVERSE,] who is absent, was paired with my colleague [Mr. GEDDES] on the tariff-commission bill. The pair does not appear in the RECORD. I want it so to appear, at the request of parties interested.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the gentleman will go in the RECORD. The clerks state that notice of the pair was not furnished them.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture is now before the House for debate. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. The object of this bill is to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture. The broad purpose of its advocates, frankly stated, is to create and liberally maintain an eighth executive department, which, under the vigilant chieftainship of a Cabinet officer, shall be charged with the duty of protecting and developing the vast agricultural interests of this nation.

It is impossible to overestimate either the magnitude of these interests or their vital importance to the whole country. Indeed no man is able to form even a true conception of them. We can cite statistics, but figures, like finger-boards, simply point toward something else. Thus we can say that 30,000,000 out of the 53,000,000 of persons to-day in the United States are supported by the direct profits of the field, and of these that 25,000,000 depend solely on the farm for a livelihood.

But who can grasp the import of this fact or appreciate its fullness? On the census-roll a given farmer counts "1;" yet that stroke is merely a dead sign which only points toward a living, sturdy man, who, skilled in agriculture, labors throughout a life-time in wresting from the soil that which gives food, raiment, and shelter to him and to his dependent ones. And not until you have entered into his daily life and photographed his very soul can you fully comprehend the throbbing reality which is indexed on your census-roll by the figure "1."

Nor is it within the power of the human mind to comprehend "millions" of anything. When numbers climb above hundreds of thousands they have gotten beyond realization, and no man can comprehend the true meaning of the simple statement that 25,000,000 of Americans are maintained by the farm.

We can also cite the fact that in 1880 only ten of the leading crops, raised from but 164,710,537 acres, were together worth $2,131,051,859; that the value of farm animals was nearly as great, $1,721,795,252; and that the money received from these two sources alone was $3,852,847,111. Further, that the cash value of all our agricultural products in that single year was $9,000,000,000. But no person can form a true conception of the grand total of thought, skill, labor, and pluck represented by these products, nor of the worth of those dollars to the men who thus earned them.

Yet all can see that the very magnitude of such totals, and the greater magnitude of the vivid realities to which they point, inexorably demand from this Congress a candid answer to the question: Ought not the American Government, as a government, to take instant and effective steps toward fostering this immense industry; toward flooding the nation with practical information as to the most profitable crops and cultures in the diversified sections; toward promptly informing every farmer respecting the supply and demand in home and foreign markets, and, by placing him on the same plane of knowledge with the buyer, thus protect him against the chicaneries of speculators; toward advising him as to the modes and cost of transporting products to their final world market, and by so doing sooner or later insure an equitable regulation of freight rates and a national defense against railway piracy; and finally, toward putting in the hands of that increasing multitude which each year sweeps westward into new territory the best maps and facts that exploration and science can furnish as to the topography, farming, mineral, or other resources of our unoccupied public domain, itself an empire almost equal in area to that of the organized States?

PROTECTION OF THE FARMER THE DOMINANT ISSUE OF THE FUTURE.

Mr. Speaker, this question of fostering or of ignoring the agricultural industries of the nation runs deeper into the very foundations of true statesmanship than do questions of appropriations or revenues, or even of a tariff. It touches more closely and vitally the interests of a greater number of persons than do all other issues combined. Upon its decision is pivoted the financial welfare, not only to-day, but for generations to come, of the majority of American voters. And, as the prosperity of the nation is but the aggregated prosperity of all its people, so the development of the agricultural interest is the broad road to national strength and enduring affluence among nations. Agriculture is the very soul of our national organism. And those who sneer at efforts to foster this industry as being "hay-seed demagogy" have overlooked the true purpose of a republican government, and underestimate both the intelligence and spirit of the American people. Because this general question, in one shape or another, must from the very nature of things be the dominant issue of the future, and I digress a moment to establish that proposition.

The distribution of the voting power of this House fairly indicates the relative power of the groups of people living in the several States. As a Representative is merely an agent for the persons who send him here, it is safe to say that his action on matters of legislation will be governed by the effect which the proposed legislation may have upon the material interests of his constituents; otherwise he is not a faithful agent. Which, now, will be the controlling sections of the United States, and what will be the dominant interest in those sections? Will it be the manufacturing, the commercial, or the agricultural interest? The following comparison of the percentages of the voting power in this House held by the groups of States named throws light on these queries; New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania being classified as the Middle States:

Percentage of the voting power of the States in the House of Representatives by the apportionments at the years designated.

Groups of States.	1789.	1803.	1823.	1843.	1863.	1883.
New England States	26	26	20	14	11	8
Middle States	28	31	32	29	25	21
Southern States	46	42	39	37	32	35
Western States	.....	.....	9	19	34	36

New England a hundred years ago wielded a full quarter of the vote on this floor. By the late apportionment it has less than a twelfth of the whole vote. New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, which sixty years ago had one-third of the power, will have but one-fifth during the next ten years. The Southern States, notwithstanding their extension from Virginia to Kansas and from Georgia to the Rio Grande, have fallen from 46 per cent. in 1789 to 35 per cent. in 1883; while the Western States have risen from nothing in 1803 to 36 per cent. in 1883. Assume, if you please, that the manufacturing or commercial interests will exclusively control each of the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio—which is certainly a violent presumption—still, in the next Congress the vote of all these States combined will be but 35 per cent.—35.34—and the vote of distinctively agricultural States will be 65 per cent.—64.66—nearly two to one.

Now, the material interest of the South and West is essentially agricultural, other industries being incidental or secondary. And these two sections, excluding Ohio, will, for ten years to come, swing two-thirds of the voting power in national legislation. It is safe, then, to anticipate that their Representatives will guard the material and dominant interest of these sections quite as carefully as the Representatives from manufacturing or commercial centers have protected the interests of those sections. And the man who imagines that the agricultural industries of this nation are to be ignored in the future, as they have been in the past, overlooks the further fact that the next fifty millions of Americans will reside west of the Mississippi, and will mainly depend on the profits of the farm for support. But long before that event happens the ruling industry of this nation will have received due attention by the National Government.

OBJECT OF THE BILL.

It is not claimed that the bill before us is perfect, or at all commensurate with the importance of the subject, but it is a start in the right direction. Its object is squarely stated in the first paragraph of section 3:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of collecting and disseminating all important and useful information concerning agriculture, and also concerning such scientific matters or industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture, the Secretary shall organize the following bureaus, namely: 1, the bureau of agricultural products; 2, of animal industry; 3, of lands, and 4, of statistics.

There is an old adage that "knowledge is power," which, like most adages, is true or false as the conditions of its application vary. The knowledge of an intricate channel is power to a pilot; by it he guides a vessel to safety, and without it he would not be a pilot. But that same knowledge is not a power to an engineer whose locomotive follows fixed rails. Each vocation demands specific knowledge which is all powerful in it, but which may be of no use in other vocations.

This bill rests upon the principle that it is the duty of government to give to the farmers of America all such important and practical information respecting their vocation as will insure greater yields and better profits; such as a knowledge of the most profitable crops in a given section, the best varieties of seeds, the best fertilizers and modes of cultivation; or, such as the most profitable breeds and their protection against disease; or, such as the probable effect of domestic and foreign markets on prices.

That sort of knowledge, carefully collected and promptly disseminated, would be of incalculable value to the American farmer, because it would save him from making experiments which others, by costly experience, have found to be mistakes, because it would insure greater certainty to his operations, lessen his labor, increase his growths, and enlarge his profits. In short it would be just the power that would turn into success that which otherwise would be either a partial or total failure.

But this is a kind and extent of information which no farmer or set of farmers can afford to gather. To obtain it there must be a broad organization, trained men, ample means, and tireless persistence. And either the National Government, which can create the organism and command the men and means, must do this work, or that work hereafter, as heretofore, will remain undone. I shall not at this time discuss the machinery proposed by the bill, preferring to deal with the great object it seeks to attain.

THE MEASURE CONSTITUTIONAL.

But few persons will deny the proposition that Congress has the constitutional power to collect and disseminate such knowledge respecting the greatest of our national industries. Its authority to provide for the general welfare is coequal with its power to raise revenues and to provide for the common defense, as stated in article 1, section 8:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

It is under this section that books are copyrighted and inventions patented, and under this exact clause that the wonderful pyramid of our manufacturing and mechanical industry has been erected.

Fifty years ago the capital invested in cotton factories was $40,000,000, and the amount of cotton used was 77,759,316 pounds; to-day the capital is $225,000,000 and the material used 793,240,500 pounds. Forty years ago the woolen factories used 50,808,524 pounds of wool, turning out products worth $20,696,699. In 1880 187,616,605 pounds of wool were manufactured into articles worth $234,587,671. In the last ten years our silk products have increased from a value of $12,210,662 to $34,410,463. Fifty years ago there were but few tanneries and no shoe factories. In 1870 4,237 tanneries, using $9,000,000 worth of bark, 9,000,000 hides, and 9,664,000 skins, produced leather worth $86,169,383; while the 3,151 shoe factories turned out articles worth $146,704,000. In 1830 the yield of the iron furnaces was 165,000 tons; in 1880 that of iron and steel works was 7,265,000 tons, worth $296,557,685. In but twenty years the capital employed in making machinery has increased from $15,000,000 to $40,000,000, and the annual product is worth $20,000,000. In 1810 the value of paper made in the United States was $2,000,000, in 1870 it was $50,842,445. To quote the words of Commissioner Loring, from whose address these facts are collated, "the aggregate annual product of the manufacturing and mechanical industries of the United States is now more than $6,000,000,000. Of this vast product less than $200,000,000 are exported."

Whatever may be the diversity of opinion as to the justice of tariff legislation, there can be no dispute as to the worth to the nation of these industries themselves, nor as to the beneficence of the countless forges and factories in giving employment to millions of skilled workmen whose intelligence and deftness place them in the front rank of the world's artisans, and who, without this employment, would be on the farm and competing with farmers. These are plethoric facts over which all men rejoice.

And that these colossal results are directly due to the fostering action of the National Government no one to-day either disputes or regrets. Since 1791, when Alexander Hamilton as Secretary of the Treasury advised the renewal of a duty of 3 cents a pound on raw cotton imported, and an increased duty on all imported cotton goods, it has been the steady policy of this nation to develop its own resources, to foster its industries, to protect its workmen, and to deepen, broaden, and quicken the great stream of manufactures, which, like that of the Gulf, strikes the shores of other continents and tempers the conditions of other peoples.

DUTY OF CONGRESS TO FOSTER AGRICULTURE.

Now, upon exactly the same ground that manufactures have been created and the mechanic protected, I claim it to be equally the right and duty of Congress to develop the greater industry of agriculture and to protect its farmers, who largely outnumber its artisans. Because, first, a farm is a machine in the same sense that a steam-engine is a machine; and because, second, the annual products of this industry are far more valuable to the nation than are those of all other industries combined.

The chief difference between an engine and an acre is that man made the one and God made the other. The first is designed to so apply power gotten from steam as to change the relative position of matter. The second is designed to create matter, in a certain sense; that is, by rotting a single grain of wheat to create a new stalk and a hundred new grains.

In the former case the engineer brings together heat and water, and opening the throttle-valve does nothing further than to prevent waste from friction. In the latter case the farmer mellows the soil, sows the seed, and prevents waste from weed or insect, while the Great Creator, turning the earth as a throttle-valve, lets on or shuts off the light, heat, and moisture which, with soil and air, not only weave the wonderful fabrics we call blossom or fruit but actually build the very loom itself, in the shape of plant or tree, which does the weaving. In either case man merely brings together certain forces of nature, while they do the work. So that the farmer is a true engineer quite as exactly as is the mechanic, while the farm is a magnificent machine, infinitely more mysterious and powerful than the mightiest engine that will ever drive a shaft.

And if it be wise for government to foster its forges and spindles far more is it bound to develop that vaster mechanism everywhere and thickly packed between the Atlantic and Pacific, to which the air conveys the raw material, for which the clouds carry moisture, and which the sun keeps driving and throbbing till its product carpets a continent with soft grasses, tints it with grains, and flecks it with hirsute forests. Talk of American forges and factories, what are all of them put together when contrasted with God's continental workshop for supplying food for man, beast, and plant? And if it has been found legitimate and expedient for the Government by legislation to develop the one, then certainly is it bound to develop the other.

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS FIVE TIMES GREATER THAN ALL OTHER EXPORTS.

In comparing the products of our farms with those of the factories, it is easier to find the value of the latter than of the former, because a farmer only sells what he does not use, while all the articles of a factory enter the market. The most careful estimates place the annual value of all manufactured products at $6,000,000,000, and of all agricultural products at $9,000,000,000. The total sales of the United States to other nations in 1880 amounted to $823,946,352. Of these the agricultural products constituted 83 per cent., worth $683,010,976, while all other products were but 17 per cent. And yet less than 8 per cent. of our agricultural products go to foreign markets, 93 per cent. being used at home. Nor was that an exceptional year. For the last sixty years the proportion of agricultural to total exports has never fallen below 79 per cent., and averages over 81 per cent., as is shown by the following interesting facts kindly furnished by the statistician of the Agricultural Department, Mr. J. R. Dodge:

OUR SURPLUS.

The immense increase of our exports in sixty years past makes an extraordinary showing, but it is a more remarkable fact that with the growth of population and of varied industries the agricultural surplus should more than maintain its proportion to total exports. The customs figures are as follows:

Year.	Exports.	Agricultural exports.
			Per cent.
1820	$51,683,640	$41,657,673	80.60
1830	58,524,878	48,095,184	82.18
1840	111,660,561	92,548,067	82.93
1850	134,900,233	108,605,713	80.57
1860	316,242,423	256,560,972	81.14
1870	455,208,341	361,188,483	79.34
1880	823,946,353	683,010,976	82.90

In the last ten years the exports of agriculture have nearly doubled, and at the same time the proportion to total exports has increased.

The great progress and prominence of breadstuffs and provisions in this record is shown in connection with cotton, which fifty years ago constituted about five-eighths of the exports of agriculture. The decennial record is as follows:

Year.	Breadstuffs.	Provisions.	Cotton.
1830	$7,071,767	$2,971,002	$29,674,883
1840	13,535,926	3,503,704	63,870,307
1850	13,066,509	10,927,485	71,984,616
1860	24,422,310	16,612,443	191,806,555
1870	72,250,933	29,175,539	227,027,624
1880	288,036,835	127,043,242	211,535,905

The proportion of cotton exports is reduced to about three-tenths, having lost half its relative prominence; while breadstuffs have advanced their proportion from 17 to 42 per cent., and with provisions, bread and meat together, six-tenths of all our agricultural exports are included.

In view of this fact, which is so constant in its occurrence as to become a law of our national industry, those gentlemen who maintain the right and obligation of government to develop our mineral resources and protect the mechanic, must logically maintain, with five times the emphasis, the obligation of government to supply its farmers with that practical knowledge which may enable them "to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before," and to protect them against the rapacity of carriers and speculators, because our agricultural exports always have been and always will be five times more valuable than all other exports combined.

GOVERNMENTAL NEGLECT OF AGRICULTURE.

It is singular that so little attention has been given to the agricultural industry by the Government, in view of its importance as the great source of national wealth and export. Foreign affairs are represented in the Cabinet by a secretary; so are the Treasury, the Army, Navy, Post-Office, Patent Office, and even the United States Attorney's. These seven Secretaries constitute the official and confidential advisers of the President, upon whom he necessarily depends for detailed information touching the interests intrusted to their respective Departments, and who, by virtue of that fact, have much to do with shaping the course of the administration and of legislation as to these interests. In name, but only in name, we have a Department of Agriculture. It is not an Executive Department. It is not even a bureau of an Executive Department, nor are its interests represented by any secretary in Cabinet consultations. Neither in scope nor power is it the equal of a score of "offices," like those of lands or patents.

And yet the establishment of this so-called department is the only step which Congress has yet taken toward guarding the chiefest of all the nation's industries. And the following communication from Mr. J. R. Dodge, in addition to showing how this step accidentally happened to be taken, throws light upon the circumstances which molded the law under which it now acts:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1882.

SIR: In accordance with your request I give you a brief statement of the origin and organization of the Department of Agriculture. While the organic law in which the existing organization is founded was passed May 15, 1862, a prior organization, the agricultural division of the Patent Office, had a tentative existence for more than twenty years.

In 1836 and 1837, Hon. Henry L. Ellsworth, Commissioner of Patents, distributed without legal authorization certain plants and seeds gratuitously transmitted to him. March 3, 1839, an appropriation of $1,000 was made by Congress from the Patent Office fund for collecting and distributing seeds, and for collecting agricultural statistics. The officers of the Navy and the diplomatic corps were solicited to procure valuable seeds. In 1840 there were 30,000 packages distributed. The appropriation has been omitted but one year, in 1846. Up to 1854 there had been $39,000 taken from the patent fund, which was reimbursed in 1855, and since that date the money appropriated has been taken directly from the Treasury.

In 1856 a propagating garden was established on the Government grounds between Four-and-a-half and Sixth streets, at first used largely for the production of sorghum seed, which had first been imported by the division in 1854. In 1854 the subject of economic entomology came up, and the investigation of habits of insects injurious to vegetation was commenced. In April, 1859, an importation of tea seed caused the sorghum field to be transformed into a tea garden. In 1858 an eight-day session of American agriculturists was held under the auspices of this division of the Patent Office. The change in the organization was effected through the efforts of the superintendent of the division, Hon. Isaac Newton, who also obtained the appropriation of $100,000 for erecting the present department building, which was built under the direction of his successor, General Horace Capron, without asking a dollar further for its completion. This is a very condensed history of the successive steps by which the present machinery of the department was brought into operation. While agricultural statistics demanded attention from the first, systematic crop reporting was not undertaken till late in 1863, and not brought to include all the States until 1866. The monthly reports were continued till 1870, and then superseded by special reports.

Yours, truly,

J. R. DODGE.

Hon. J. A. ANDERSON.

THE EXISTING LAW A FARCE.

By the present law the duties of the Department of Agriculture are exceedingly limited and grotesquely out of proportion with the importance of this industry. They consist of exactly two things: first, "to acquire and diffuse useful information on subjects connected with agriculture;" and, second, "to procure and distribute rare and valuable plants." Just these and nothing else are declared by section 520 to be "the general design and duties" of the Department. And it is noticeable that this "general design" is not to acquire information as to the agriculture of the United States, nor even of practical agriculture anywhere, but only of "subjects connected with agriculture," such, say, as entomology or chemistry.

Still more limited are the powers for executing this design. Section 526 enacts that the Commissioner shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by books and correspondence, by experiments, by the collection of statistics, and by other appropriate means within his power. With respect to rare and valuable plants, he is to collect, test, "propagate such as may be worthy of propagation," and distribute these among agriculturists.

Fairly construed that law simply establishes a mere bureau of archives, in which may be deposited such dissertations on subjects "connected with" agriculture and such statistics as the Commissioner happens to obtain, and from which may be distributed such foreign seeds as the benevolence of travelers or other governments might have donated. Just think of it! The brainiest and richest nation on earth, one which sports its own particular eagle, shoots off its own Fourth of July, and as it waltzes down the world's ball-room expects queens to be fascinated by its superb grace and emperors to be dazzled by its sparkling generosity; one which, after eating 90 per cent. of its agricultural products, finds that the tenth which it sells constitutes four-fifths of its exports; this nation by legislative enactment solemnly boxes up a lot of moonshine and triumphantly designates that box a "Department of Agriculture," where under the existing statute donations of foreign seeds will be thankfully received, postage prepaid!

I am not in the least seeking to belittle either the worth or the work of the Department. Each is infinitely better than the law allows. Fortunately both Congress and the Commissioners have in late years overridden the statute. But that organic law is a burlesque; just these two duties, and no more, are the lawful duty of the Commissioner, and just these powers, and no others, are the legal powers of this pretended Department, which is a real and forceful "Department," in the constitutional sense of that word, about as much as an oyster is an elephant. And if anything on the American continent needs "enlarging," it is "the general design, duties, and powers" of this alleged Department of Agriculture.

PROTECTION OF AGRICULTURE THE REAL PROBLEM OF AMERICAN STATESMANSHIP.

Mr. Speaker, the day has gone by when this Government, simply on the principle of self-preservation, can longer afford to neglect the greatest of its industries, or to withhold from a full half of its laboring masses that information which will most strengthen them in their life-battle against all nations and climes for remunerative prices at the world's counter. Even a miser feeds the hen that lays the golden egg. The great problem of the near future which American statesmanship must solve is this: How, with enormous products to be transported across half a continent and then across an ocean, are American farmers to compete with the cheap labor of Europe and Asia and still make sufficient profit to support themselves and educate their children?

Stump speeches will not serve as an answer; nor will demagogical planks in party platforms. Truckling to the threats of gigantic railroad corporations will not change a single factor of that problem. Macadamizing creek beds, or building levees for the Mississippi to wash away, will not meet this case. Even that sovereign panacea for all the ills to which manufacturers are heirs—the tariff—is but a partial answer. Paying the debt, maintaining an Army and Navy, making liberal appropriations for the support of Government, or even adopting the great Democratic measure of reducing the tax on whisky and tobacco, will not furnish the solution. None of these things will lessen the distance your products must be moved, or raise the wages of a single laborer in the old world. After all such measures are adopted the conditions of the problem still remain. Each year they grow, come closer, and glare more imperiously. And the sooner Congress grapples them the better, for, unlike interstate commerce bills, you cannot smother these conditions in House committees. They resemble Banquo's ghost, and "will not down at your bidding."

How long, think you, will it be until the number of persons in the United States dependent on the farm for support will be as great as our total population in 1880? Only thirty years, gentlemen! The estimates of Professor E. P. Elliot, which are thoroughly reliable, place our population in 1890 at 64,476,000; in 1900 at 81,529,000; in 1910 at 101,310,000; and at that time 50,000,000 of our people will be engaged in agriculture. Now, suppose that, as the inevitable result of increasing competition with the cheap and cheapening labor of Europe and Asia, and by reason of the uncontrolled rapacity of railways, these 50,000,000 of Americans, so far from making a profit by agriculture, can only eke out a bare existence—as do English farmers to-day—then what? Will there be any riots? Will there be fewer happy homes and more prisons, smaller school-houses and larger poor-houses?

With a free ballot in the hands of a discontented majority on the one side, and the corruptionists of corporations on the other side, what would be the character of your legislation, the permanence of your laws, or the durability of your institutions? Each succeeding decade will intensify the problem. At the close of the next century our population will exceed 200,000,000, and with density of population come all the evils that blacken Asia to-day. So that, simply as a cold-blooded measure of self-preservation, it is safer and cheaper for this Government to expend thousands of dollars in protecting and developing its agricultural industries now than to expend millions hereafter in suppressing the inevitable results of its neglect.

GOVERNMENT'S REVENUES DEPENDENT UPON PROFITABLE FARMING.

There is another reason for governmental action. As government derives its revenues from the people, any measure which tends to increase the prosperity of the whole people is a legitimate subject for national legislation. The man who sells more than he buys makes money. The nation which receives more for its exports than it pays for its imports is growing rich. No one can say what the value of our exports will be thirty or fifty years hence. But it is absolutely certain that four-fifths of the whole export in any year will consist of agricultural products. If the farmer is not remunerated for raising these products he will stop work, and four-fifths of your export would cease. That would stop your imports, and so stop your revenues. And this is the least of the evils which must result from unprofitable farming, because the capital and men now employed in agriculture would, of course, be transferred to other pursuits; cut-throat competition in manufacturing and all branches of trade would follow, necessitating less profits to capital and lower wages to mechanics and all tradesmen. That would sweep away the remaining fifth of your imports, occasion a direct tax on capital or poll, and result in such general depression as might end in anarchy. It is upon a remunerated agriculture that the revenues of the Government and the prosperity of the whole nation rest. The profits of agriculture depend upon the intelligence and skill of our farmers—not as men nor citizens, but as successful farmers.

Hence it is not only legitimate but essential that government as a government shall place in the hands of all farmers the best practice and suggestions that the best experience of its most successful agriculturists can furnish; that it shall promptly advise the farmer of anything and everything in this or any country which will affect market prices; that it shall by a strong arm protect him against extortionate rates and maintain every agency that will give him success in his competition with the Old World, by giving him truer knowledge, greater skill, surer remedies, and better processes. Half the appropriation annually made for the Army or Navy thus expended would in ten years' time double our exports and make the rich basin lying between the Alleghanies and the Rockies the garden and granary of the civilized globe.

THE RAILROAD GAME.

Entertaining these views, I am opposed to the substitute for this bill, of which notice has been given by the gentleman from West Virginia. It proposes to abolish the Department of Agriculture and to establish a "department of industries," consisting of a division of agriculture and a division of commerce. The interests of agriculture differ from those of commerce, exactly as do the interests of the farmer from these of the merchant. The first raises and sells; the second buys and ships. The former is a producer; the latter is the agent for the consumer. In the sense that agriculture or manufacturing is a creative "industry," commerce is not an industry. And to co-ordinate these two divisions in a department of industries would, to my notion, be like putting a lamb and wolf in the same field. That commercial wolf would be mighty apt to swallow the agricultural lamb. It undoubtedly would do so if the division of commerce amounted to anything and was "true to name," because the great bulk of our farm products are transported by rail, and the railroad system is virtually in the hands of a few millionaires.

It is to their interest to charge the highest rates an article will bear, and they vigilantly guard that interest. If common report be true, these corporations sometimes control State Legislatures, defeat Congressmen, and elect Senators; and if it be fair to judge a tree by its fruits and a majority of the Supreme Court by its decisions, this same influence has force in the final determination of railroad cases. With a division of commerce in such a department of industries, would not these corporations somehow see to it that their commercial interests were in nowise endangered by any effort of the agricultural division to protect the farmer against extortionate freights? Well, perhaps!

But, on the other hand, if this division of commerce is not to amount to anything, then I am opposed to making agriculture a mere division of any department, desiring to see it protected by a powerful executive department for its own exclusive benefit.

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

Mr. Speaker, I have sought to state frankly the purposes of the bill before us and some reasons for its adoption. For a moment think of the countless farms clustered or dotted between the Atlantic and Pacific; of the aggregate labor expended in raising crops; of the weary months between sowing and selling; of the risks; of the priceless worth to these sturdy toilers of that practical knowledge contemplated by this measure; and then think how much their labor would be diminished and their profits increased by the vigorous maintenance of such a department. In that event the national flag, rendered precious to many a Northern farmer by his own self-sacrifice, would become doubly endeared to all farmers South and North as the flag, not of savage war, but of blessed munificent peace, signaling to each of them, whether in column or on outer picket, the grand rush of a mighty nation and such guidance and re-enforcement as would assure them the victory in their battle with nature for grains, and with Europe for the gains, that to these millions mean food and homes.

I am not now speaking from the plane of revenues or expediency, nor at all thinking of the constitutional power to insure domestic tranquillity or to provide for the common defense. These powers inhere in all nations and as well in beasts. But I am thinking of another power nearer Godlike than human, flashed into manhood among the farms of Palestine, the glory and crown of humanity, and which to-day is the very soul of our Republic—the constitutional power to promote the general welfare; a power which, when exercised by a great and generous nation for the enlightenment and protection of its workers, enables them to lift themselves from poverty to competence, ennobles them with a spirit of self-dependence and independence, brings rest to weary wives, insures education to children, beautifies homes, and lights up a whole continent with the glow of happiness.

Be it our task to assure the national exercise of this power vigorously, steadily; and may its broadening be as the national growth. In such an event, and peering into the future fifty or a hundred years hence, one catches glimpses of a still brighter continent, with vaster belts of grain, with denser, busier, and richer multitudes, and over it all the flag of to-day more thickly clustered with stars, somehow more lustrous, even as if God were smiling through them.

I reserve the rest of my time. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. VALENTINE.) The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, in May, 1838, the citizens of Kentucky, through their Senator, Mr. Lynn, petitioned Congress to establish at Washington a "department of agriculture and mechanics," the head of which was to have a seat in the Cabinet. This petition was a model of conciseness. It was short and yet wonderfully comprehensive. This secretary was to be supplied with assistants, whose duty it would be to forward blank forms to every teacher and literary institution in the Union to be filled up with information gleaned from farmers, mechanics, merchants, professional men, and citizens generally concerning soils, minerals, crops, implements, seeds, modes of culture, styles of buildings, condition of manufactures, state of education, and practical information of all kinds whatsoever to be obtained in their respective school districts. Premiums were to be offered for discoveries. The study of insects injurious to agriculture was to be encouraged. A system of weather reports was recommended, similar to those now in vogue, to advise farmers of anticipated sudden changes. Improved and newly invented implements were to be tested by competent engineers. Rare and valuable seeds from foreign countries were to be purchased and distributed. Practical agricultural and mechanical information of every possible character was to be collected through our foreign ministers and consuls, naval and Army officers, and forwarded to this department, there to be collated, and in condensed form to be distributed to all the teachers in the Union, and by them to be imparted to their pupils, in the language of the petition, "thus to direct the active, ardent minds of the youth of the United States to investigations in natural history and the mechanic arts."

Mr. Speaker, among original patents the most valuable are those which are far in advance of the times, and such was the case with this petition. With exact nicety it defined duties and blazed out lines of action, forecasting those identical systems which by slow development have at last cropped out into practical utility; but itself was consigned to oblivion, because it was far beyond the ken of the Committee of Agriculture of that day, which met once to organize and a second time to disband.

Nearly twenty years later the editor of an agricultural monthly published in Montgomery, Alabama, contended that an industry so extensive should be represented in the President's Cabinet by a secretary of agriculture. At that time the entire cereal product of the United States was less than the product of a half-dozen of our present Northwestern States, and the almost boundless grain area of the Northwest of to-day was then the tramping ground of the red man and his cloven-footed game. Agriculture then received but meager national recognition. An annual appropriation of $5,000 and a medium-sized room in the Patent Office, presided over by a protégé of the Interior Department, constituted the agricultural paternity of the Government.

The descanting of the Alabama editor shared the fate of the Kentucky petition. It lived almost the constitutional life-time of a patent, free from interference or infringement from any quarter. Meantime, however, our agricultural area was widening and lengthening with unprecedented rapidity, and our increased annual production was commensurate with our extending agricultural area. The attention of legislators was forced to the importance of this grand industry either by the growing magnificence of these productions, or perhaps by the concomitant results of civil war, so that in 1862 the Congress of the United States gave a statutory existence to a partially equipped Department of Agriculture. The creation, however, seemed to have been abnormal, for Congressional apathy upon the subject succeeded, and a second life-time of a patent expired before a single voice was heard here or elsewhere asking further recognition of our widespread community of farmers. On the one hand the cultivators of the soil were beguiled by the congratulatory laudation that they were too independent, too self-supporting to ask or even expect favors at the hands of the Government. While on the other, current opinion settled down into the conviction that farmers were at best but clod-hoppers, more automatic than intelligent, whose province it was "to plow and to sow, to reap and to mow," while representatives from all other vocations manipulated the affairs of state. As a result of these two divergent opinions farmers and their profession have been ignored by the Government, and have become infinitesimal factors in the field of politics, except perhaps on the day of election, when farmers are expected to do their whole duty and quit themselves like men.

But, sir, as education has become more generally diffused and civilization has advanced, agriculture, as a science, has become more correctly appreciated. Indeed, farmers themselves have begun to think, and their thoughts have sprung into vocal life, singing praises to their cherished avocation. The marvel of the age is the immensity of their annual productions. The mystery of the telegraph and the power of steam have been invoked to inform the world that we have enough and to spare. The eyes of the world have been turned intently upon us; we can scarcely see ourselves as others see us; hungry millions are seeking our shores, less because this is the land of the free than because it is the land of plenty, and we bid them welcome because we know they will soon kill their own fatted calf for those who will follow them. "Progress and development" is the trade-mark of the American farmer. And agriculture, not content with the embryonic legislation of the past, demands something more at our hands than the privilege of distributing gratuitously among our farmers a few thousands of dollars' worth of seeds purchased from our own nurserymen. And hence the presentation of the bill now under consideration, which comes with a unanimous report from the largest committee of this House.

Mr. Speaker, there is much in our democratic-republican polity that the American farmer does not entirely comprehend, and perhaps equally as much that he most keenly appreciates. He knows that "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance," and that to enjoy his rights he should dare maintain them. That to enjoy the blessings of good government there should be favoritism to none and equal privileges to all. But the insolvable conundrum with him is, Why is it that official prominence is at all times and everywhere given to all other vocations rather than to agriculture? Is this the case, Mr. Speaker? Whether it be so or not the farmers of our country believe it is, and in my opinion they are justified in their conviction. They believe further that the millions of money covered annually into our Treasury through taxation are burdens unequally levied, and are not expended or disbursed with impartiality. The greater portion of these vast sums are gathered from the farmers, for they wear more shoes and hats, more cotton and woolen clothing, sleep under more blankets, use more iron, eat more sugar, chew more tobacco, and perhaps drink more whisky, and of course then pay more taxes than the remainder of our population. But do they receive in return a quid pro quo? True, to live under the ægis of "the best government the world ever saw" is their heritage. But this is a reciprocated blessing, given as well as received, and is not obtained by heavy taxation or liberal appropriations of money.

The thoughtful farmer, soliloquizing upon this subject, often surmises that he is equally discriminated against in the disbursement of our annual revenues. He knows that our Navy is a public scandal, and yet sees it gulping millions of the public money every year. He feels that we are at peace with all the world and that our Army has scarcely picket duty to perform on our frontier, yet millions are annually appropriated to maintain a war-footing, among the officers at least, if not among the privates. Understanding somewhat the complex nature of our political organization, he knows that we have an Interior Department, whose administration, traversing our entire domain, annually expends other millions of the people's money, but never for a moment investigates the agricultural necessities of the country. He knows, too, we have that great Revenue Department, radiating from this capital like a mighty octopod, laying its excise clutches upon this product and demanding imposts of that manufactured article, whose Argus-eyed inspectors even a ship load of beef-cattle for exportation cannot escape. And coupled with this information is that further knowledge that the heads of all these Departments are members of the President's Cabinet. Is he not then justified in the inference, Mr. Speaker, that representation in the executive cabal is the means through which these advantages, these privileges, and these powers are secured?

This same thoughtful farmer, Mr. Speaker, remembers that away back in "Old Hickory's" time an additional counselor was demanded by the President to avoid entanglement in the labyrinthal affairs of our postal service, and he well understands how much more necessary such a counselor is in these days of fast-mail trains, expedited services, and star-route embezzlements. Nor is he less impressed that a proper administration of the laws is essential to the preservation of society, and that the jurisprudence of fifty millions of people is a complex science, which the President might well hestitate to execute without the aid of an advisory associate. The necessity for this conclave of executive counselors he fully appreciates. But he cannot comprehend why the greatest of all our interests does not need, should not have, and would not be benefited by a similar representation in the President's Cabinet. The chief source of our national wealth is the product of the soil; our very existence is dependent upon our agricultural success. Ninety per cent. of our exports are directly or indirectly the products of the farm, and that balance of trade so essential in securing and continuing our national prosperity can only be preserved by these exportations, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars annually. Surely an industry so magnificent in production, so extended in area, and so universal in its bearing is justly entitled to more national recognition than it has heretofore received at the hands of the Government, and should not be left to individual or local enterprise for development.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen on this floor who frequently consume hours discussing points of order with a view to promote or prevent party supremacy, will, with a nonchalance that is really entertaining, assure me that there is not one word in the Constitution authorizing the appropriation of a single dollar for any such purpose. Perhaps in totidem verbis this is the truth, but there is much in the spirit that is not to be found in the letter of that sacred instrument. The framers of our organic law were neither prophets nor the sons of prophets, and were no more able to look down the stream of time into this wonderful age in which we are living than we are to tell who will be President, if happily we should have one, "when the clock of time strikes 1900." When certain expressed powers were delegated, and others not enumerated were reserved, it must have been anticipated that in the future unknown factors would arise, which were to be legislated upon and construed as time and circumstances demanded. The organization of a Cabinet seems to have been one of these unknown factors, for nowhere in the Constitution can the word cabinet be found, nor an intimation of the existence of such a conclave.

The Constitution authorizes the President to "require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices," but these Departments themselves only have a statutory existence, for it was not until six months after the inauguration of our first President that Congress passed a law organizing a Department and assigning it specific duties; and as our population has increased multifarious enterprises have arisen requiring the more immediate supervision of the Government, and Congress has had the wisdom to create what was demanded of it, new and additional Executive Departments. But where has the letter or the spirit of the Constitution been violated by such legislation? Since the adoption of our Constitution many things have received the sanction of law which were not in accordance with its letter, nor perhaps its spirit, but it does not follow that all such legislation was an infraction of that instrument. Necessities have arisen which nothing but divine wisdom could have foretold, and of which the framers of our Constitution had not the faintest shadow of a conception. Then, how could fallible human nature, one hundred years ago, have indited a political principle, and, condensing it into a few terse sentences, have made it rigidly applicable in detail to the myriad of ever changing circumstances that arise in a progressive nationality of fifty millions of people?

Mr. Speaker, allow me to draw upon your imagination for a moment. Resurrect the author of the Constitution and place him in the White House; inform him of our immense bonded debt which we shoulder so complacently; advise him that our imposts are $200,000,000 annually, and that our excises are $150,000,000; that our exports, chiefly agricultural, amount annually to $800,000,000; tell him that palace cars of many tons weight flit across our continent in eight days, rolling upon wheels made of paper; that magnificent steamers in the same length of time cross the Atlantic and deliver in the English markets fresh beef butchered in America one thousand miles inland from port of shipment; introduce him to the hundred thousand Mongolians on our Pacific slope; place a telephone to his ear that he may hear the discussions upon this floor of the representatives of fifty millions of people; give him a morning paper that he may read, as we do daily, notices of events happening in Europe six hours, sun time, before they did actually occur, and then ask him to frame us a Constitution. Think you he would indite us the identical organic law under which we have lived for a century? He doubtless would submit for our approval the same fundamental principles contained in that instrument, but I imagine a latitude of construction would be allowed not now deemed admissible by those who see an infraction of the Constitution in every assumption of new power by the legislative branch of the Government. I favor a strict construction of our organic law, and I do not consider this position shaken when I say that the passage of this bill will be the exercise of a "power reserved to the people," for I believe it is the wish of the people that it should be enacted into law. When the Constitution delegates to Congress "the power to provide for the general welfare of the United States," a majority of these sovereign States being principally agricultural, it can be no forced construction of that instrument to determine that Congress has the power in the manner here suggested to promote an industry that affects directly more than half the people of our country, and indirectly every man, woman, and child within our confines.

Sir, fostering agriculture is no class legislation; much less is it centralizing power in defiance of the Constitution, for it is the people's cause as well as the nation's life. You may scuttle every American vessel and raze to the ground all our manufacturing establishments, this people would still remain as proud, as independent, and as self-supporting as any people on earth. But should the vengeful power of an offended Deity destroy but for a single season all our agricultural products, annihilation, both individual and national, would be our inevitable doom. No, sir, agriculture is a science too vast in its extent, too powerful in its bearing upon the welfare of the people to be considered in the same legislative category with our other manifold industries. But we do not ask for an appropriation to develop it as a science, nor do we propose to legislate into special prominence any of its branches. We simply ask favorable legislation upon this bill, which organizes an executive department of agriculture pure and simple, with all the cognate subdivisions. Nor do we fear that such legislation will transgress any precept of the Constitution, but on the contrary will receive the plaudits of the people.

Mr. Speaker, every civilized nation in the world except Great Britain has given more prominence to the cause of agriculture than the United States. Germany, Russia, Austria, and France each has either a minister or secretary of agriculture. Spain and Italy each has a department of agriculture and commerce. Sweden, Norway, Belgium, and Switzerland each has a department of interior with distinct bureaus assigned to agriculture. The Netherlands and Portugal each has a department, combining navigation, agriculture, and commerce. European Turkey, where it is problematical whether the civilization of the nineteenth century has ever reached, has, like England, given no recognition to agriculture.

And our cisatlantic neighbors have generally given national importance to agriculture. Mexico and the republics of South America have each a department of agriculture and statistics under the supervision of a secretary of interior.

Sir, when all other civilized nations have thus wisely and justly exalted agriculture would it not be entirely in accord with our position as the foremost agricultural nation in the world to give preeminent recognition to this fundamental industry? Such legislation will injure no one, and it will benefit the masses. The cause deserves it, and moreover the people demand it.

The only incorporated national agricultural organization with which I am acquainted is the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry, and that body, in convention assembled in Chicago, Illinois, in 1876, representing an agricultural constituency of nearly a million farmers, scattered through twenty-eight sovereign States, and each State represented by at least two delegates in said convention, unanimously adopted a lengthy preamble and series of resolutions, from which I extract the following:

Whereas it is the duty of wise and just legislators to see that the blessings and burdens of government are laid with impartial rule upon all classes alike: Therefore,

Resolved, That American agriculturists demand that they shall be recognized as a real factor in this Government by the establishment of a department of agriculture, to be presided over by a Cabinet officer, who shall organize the same upon a plan to be devised by the wisdom of Congress, which department shall embrace to the fullest extent the agricultural interests of 50,000,000 of people.

Annually since 1876 that body has assembled, and at every session, including the last one, held in November, 1881, almost under the very shadow of this Capitol, they resolved that "in their opinion the Commissioner should become the secretary of agriculture, and thereby be made a member of the President's Cabinet;" and that "the Department of Agriculture should be sustained and encouraged by appropriations commensurate with its importance." And, sir, these resolutions were not adopted hastily or unadvisedly, but after the unanimous report of a committee to whom they had been referred had been freely and ably discussed by men who correctly appreciated the wishes of the constituency they represented.

Mr. Speaker, no people are more sensitive of their rights than farmers, but they are never obtrusive. Their isolated lives are effective barriers to their co-operation, and that combination so frequently resorted to among almost all other classes desiring to induce favorable Congressional legislation upon any measure is unknown among them. No influence, for instance, social, financial, or political, is present with us to-day from the agriculturists, soliciting the passage of this bill. There is no agricultural "lobby" here. During the discussion of the tariff-commission bill, it is well known that tobacco manufacturers and whisky manufacturers were admitted upon this floor, contrary to the rules of the House, who lost no time in ventilating their opinions freely among the members upon the question of amending or abolishing our internal-revenue laws. And during the discussion upon the first Chinese bill, that was vetoed by the President, we were told by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] that the "Six Companies" and the railroads had organized a powerful lobby here antagonistic to that bill. But in this instance we hear nothing of the kind. The appeal, however, is none the less importunate. A great ground swell has come up from the rural districts all over the land, bearing upon its crest the petitions of the more intelligent farmers of the country, urging the legislation contained in this bill. And why shall we not give favorable consideration to these petitions?

Beside the constitutional objection already considered I have heard members opposing the legislation here proposed upon the ground that it would be simply whipping agriculture into politics by adding to the coterie of secretaries another political partisan whose official tenure would be so short that he could render no service to the cause of agriculture. To a certain extent this would be true, for surely no man would be invited into a Cabinet, or would accept, if invited, who was not in political sympathy with the appointing power. But it no more follows that efficiency in a secretary of agriculture implies partisan politics than that an efficient officer could not be secured unless he were a partisan. This objection, if valid, can with equal propriety be urged against any and all the other Departments of our Government. And if true, each political party would be warranted in asserting that the Government could not be efficiently administered unless exactly in accordance with their method of execution, a doctrine to which I cannot subscribe.

No partisanship, however, Mr. Speaker, should be manifested in a Department so directly connected with the masses as would be the Department of Agriculture, nor should there be in other Departments as intimately associated with the immediate interests of the people. But I regret to say that there is, for instance, in the Post-Office Department. Does not every member on this floor well know that the edict has gone forth from that department that none but Republicans are to be appointed to office? Have we not seen latterly numberless efficient, competent, satisfactory postmasters displaced, and in too many instances superseded by inexperienced and otherwise incompetent persons; the first simply because they were Democrats, and the latter solely because they were Republicans? And yet the administration points to results as an evidence of the correctness of their method of procedure. For myself, I have no words of censure for this course, for I make no complaint when others do unto me as I would do unto them. And besides, I think such conduct entirely natural. Efficiency of service should be the chief end, and efficiency, if obtained in the beginning, would not be lasting if the appointer and appointee were not in accord.

Nor do I think that this objection against a secretary of any more avail than a similar objection against a commissioner, and surely we have had more commissioners than Presidential administrations since the organization of the Agricultural Department, and their frequency of appointment has secured more efficiency in office.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] has introduced a bill as a substitute for the one reported by the committee, proposing to establish a "department of industries," comprising several bureaus, one of which shall be the bureau of agriculture, and the others in the course of time to be indefinite, as the title indicates that the department may comprehend any and all industries.

It appears to me, sir, that he may as well propose to organize a second Cabinet, for this ponderous department would embrace so great a diversity of interests that its head would require the investiture of the Chief Executive to enable him to perform the functions of his office. No, sir, the thing would be too big; it would be top-heavy and would necessarily disintegrate from the inability of any one man to supervise it successfully.

Nor would I be less opposed to this substitute did it simply propose to establish a dual department, embracing "agriculture and commerce." These two industries are by no means twin sisters. They are antagonistic in all their principal purposes, and no one man can satisfactorily represent the two. They are as antipodal as producer and consumer, whom no single agent can serve, because "one man cannot serve two masters." An agent for a producer must sell in the highest market. An agent for the consumer must buy in the lowest market. A representative of two as dissimilar interests would the secretary of commerce and agriculture be. Commerce is dependent upon transportation for its very existence. Nothing oppresses agriculture more than the fluctuating rates of transportation. Commerce, both external and internal, is in the hands of a comparatively few, intent upon securing net profits. Agriculture is the avocation of the masses, whose daily toil little more than provides a competency. Commerce enhances values. Agriculture creates values. Commerce only becomes an industry after agriculture has reported successful results.

Agriculture is an original, productive industry that is dependent only upon itself, and is sufficiently extensive and important to deserve separately and alone the consideration asked for it in this bill. We wage a warfare upon no other interest; simply ask substantial recognition of agriculture. I have heard the voice of the farmers throughout this broad land clamoring for the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the present Agricultural Department by an elevation of the office of commissioner to that of secretary of agriculture, endowed with all the dignities, privileges, powers, emoluments, and salary that attach to the Secretaries of the other Departments of our Government. They ask for no complication with other industries, but present their claim pure and simple. They see nothing unreasonable in the demand, nor to them does the way appear barricaded with constitutional infractions.

Mr. KENNA. If it will not interrupt the gentleman from South Carolina, I should like to ask him a question at this point.

Mr. AIKEN. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to direct the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina to clause 4 of the third section of the bill, in whose support he is speaking, as reported from his committee, and to ask him if the Committee on Agriculture of this House, as the Committee on Agriculture of every preceding House which has undertaken to deal with the subject, has not found it absolutely impossible to deal with it to their own satisfaction so far as agriculture is concerned, without also including commerce from necessity? I desire to direct his attention to the fact that the very bill in whose support he is making this speech, although it does not embrace quite so much in that line, does to a large degree embrace the very commercial idea that is embraced in this substitute.

Mr. AIKEN. I confess I cannot answer so long a question, which seems to be rather an argument or a short speech injected into mine. But I will say this: so far as the portion of the bill is concerned to which the gentleman from West Virginia refers, it simply provides for the collecting of statistical information. It does not propose to interfere with the transportation of the commerce of the country. It merely proposes to put in operation a system by which statistical facts can be gathered for the information of the people.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot, nor would it be my province if I could, forecast the benefits resulting from the passage of this bill. That they will be manifold and invaluable is evident from the fruits already produced by the present so-called Agricultural Department. Let us for a few moments glance at the history of this department and estimate its fruits. Its origin dates back to 1839, when $1,000 were appropriated to collect agricultural statistics. Annually thereafter an appropriation was made for a similar purpose for twenty-three years, no appropriation in any one year exceeding $5,000, and the Commissioner of Patents in each instance standing sponsor for the faithful disbursement of this pittance, which, with a single room in the Patent Office or perhaps a few shelves in a single room, constituted the length and breadth, height and depth of our fostering care of agriculture. It was during these years, however, that some of our most valuable seeds were imported from foreign countries. Many valuable varieties of wheat were then brought across the Atlantic, which after climatization became and continue to be to this day highly prized in several sections of the United States. It was during this period, too, that the several kinds of sorghum were introduced, which prior to the close of the war had become a staple product throughout the South.

For this saccharine plant I shall ever harbor feelings of profound gratitude, and shall never cease to panegyrize it for having been a "friend in need," and therefore a "friend indeed." But, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, there may be others here who would hurl at it their bitterest anathemas because it gave substantial aid and assistance to the most powerful rebellion in the history of civilization. Sir, in those dismal years of internecine strife, when anguish, bitter anguish, pervaded every household in this broad land, sorghum was both food and drink to the struggling South. It fed our cattle, it fattened our hogs, it sweetened our rye coffee, it made palatable our corn-dodgers, and it supplied us with a beverage, warranted, if taken in liberal potions, to kill or cure any soldier afflicted with the diseases incident to camp life. Sir, to the South sorghum has been a priceless benefaction, and to-day it is infinitely more valuable to the farmers of our whole country than all the appropriations ever granted to the cause of agriculture by the American Congress.

But, sir, it was after those twenty-three years had elapsed and in the midst of that fratricidal war that agriculture received its first practically valuable aid from the Government. In 1862 the Interior Department was relieved of its position as foster parent, and by statute the present Agricultural Department was organized, receiving $50,000 to sustain it during the succeeding fiscal year, twelve times as much as had ever been appropriated during any previous year in aid of agriculture. For the nonce this gave encouragement to the friends of the Department, and much practical benefit was anticipated. But, alas, what a disappointment! Instead of progress there was lethargy. Instead of development there was inutility, and with singular analogy it drifted along for another lifetime of a patent as if imbued with the conditions precedent to the office whence it had been removed apparently without any definite purpose in view, and remarkable for nothing save its utter fruitlessness. True, seeds of every variety were scattered gratuitously over the country, but most of them were valueless. True, also, that statistics were periodically published, but they were discredited as simple guess-work. For twelve years after the war the Department positively effected nothing, and so far from identifying itself with our agricultural interests it became estranged from our entire farming community. In 1877 new life was infused into it, whether healthful or otherwise it is not now my purpose to declare, but I am warranted in saying that for the next three years thereafter it expressed a lively sympathy with those engaged in farming, and was kept prominently before the American people. Its administration may perhaps have been chimerical, possibly extravagant, and somewhat reckless, but it cannot be denied that it manifested that zeal and energy so characteristic of our day and country, and shaking off the Vanwinkleism of previous years it actively aligned itself alongside the sympathies of the American farmer.

The series of experimental tests of the fineness, tensile strength and the felting qualities of animal fibers, together with the examination of the physical properties of vegetable fibers, inaugurated in the Department within the past three years, and now being conducted upon a limited scale, but with satisfactory results, is destined, if adequately supported by Congressional appropriations, to materially revolutionize our manufacturing as well as our agricultural enterprises. Acquired knowledge in this regard heretofore has been very limited, and up to this present time is not very extensive, but enough has been learned to establish the breeding quality of an animal through a thorough acquaintance with a single fiber from his hide.

How ignorant, too, are we, Mr. Speaker, of the quality and capacity of vegetable fibers! Of that great American staple which plays such a part in clothing the world we positively know nothing beyond its monetary value fixed by a conventional classification. Cotton may by the touch or the eye be classified as fair, ordinary, or middling, and by this method have its value more or less relatively fixed in the markets of the world; but who ever heard of samples of cotton being classified according to their textile capacity or textile strength? And yet upon these two prerequisites depends its real value to the manufacturer. The experimental tests now being conducted in the department anticipate valuable revelations upon these points, and upon many other kindred ideas of which we are at present almost totally ignorant, namely, whether compressed or impressed cotton is the better fiber for manufacturing purposes; whether the shades of color, upon which so much the price of cotton depends, result from external or internal coloring-matter; whether the cultivation of prolific cotton is not producing quantity at the expense of quality of fiber; and whether by an ascertained system of cultivation, as well as by a certain method of feeding a wool-bearing animal, a fiber, either vegetable or animal, cannot be produced that will be greatly improved, if not made absolutely perfect for textile purposes.

"But," says one, "why cannot all this information be obtained through State aid without invoking help from the Federal Government?" I think it a sufficiently satisfactory reply to say that no State has ever made such an effort, no State is now proposing to undertake such a task, and probably no State ever will endeavor to accomplish such results; and if each and all the States were to attempt severally to effect these purposes, there would be no uniformity of results, no general diffusion of the knowledge acquired, and consequently no general welfare of the people produced. The geographical area of this country is too vast and the interests of this people are too diversified to expect any individual State to be responsible for developments that promote the general welfare of the country. The moral power of the Federal Government must be the focus whence radiate the means of securing this industrial progress.

"But," says another, "why cannot a commissioner be as potent to this end as a secretary?" Mr. Speaker, it is not simply a change of name we desire, but it is an elevation of rank and official position. This House, for instance, recognizes officially no subordinate, and yet frequently defers to the judgment of official prominence. The Commissioner of Agriculture is but a subaltern of the Secretary of the Treasury. The secretary of agriculture will be the immediate national representative of 25,000,000 of people and the peer of any one in the Cabinet of the President. For this reason the farmers North, South, East, and West demand this elevation, believing that the enactment into law of the provisions of this bill will in no wise infringe any man's constitutional rights nor impede his progress in the business of life and the pursuit of happiness. It will inhibit no State-rights doctrine nor centralize the power of the Federal Government, but will give just recognition and promotion to our grandest industry, which requries the daily toil of more that half of our entire population.

Mr. MULDROW. Mr. Speaker: If I have a hobby it is the creation of a department of agriculture with a Cabinet minister at its head.

When I took my seat as a member of the Forty-fifth Congress I was impressed with the fact that although the people engaged in agricultural pursuits in this country are more than one-half of the entire population, they seem to be singularly indifferent to their own interest. They have made fewer demands and exactions, have petitioned less for what they need than any other class, and seem to be generally indifferent to their own welfare.

I found that the desks of members of Congress were covered with expensive gilt-edged publications urging the importance of railroad enterprises, of manufacturing interests, of canal projects, of subsidies for ocean steamships, all asking for protection and aid, and yet comparatively nothing was urged before Congress designed to foster and encourage this primary and paramount industry, upon which all the rest depend; and it was then, seeing this, I offered the first bill, the object of which was to elevate this department and make its chief an executive officer with the right to a place in the Cabinet of the President.

The measure was criticised by some, was ridiculed by others; the New York Tribune asserted that "it emanated from a member who hailed from a State where shot-guns were the principal implements of husbandry;" but I am glad to know that it had the effect of drawing attention to this subject, and was supported by some of the best men and leading journals of the country. The ranks of its advocates have been steadily augmented, until we find to-day but few politicians representing agricultural districts disposed to run counter to the all-pervading sentiment of this people. I have from first to last taken the position that the prosperity of our country is principally dependent on agriculture for the development and growth of all its great interests, and that this department should have a voice in that branch of the Government which exercises supervisory power to the extent of a veto over the legislation of Congress, and by and with the advice of the Senate to make treaties with foreign countries.

If the true interests of this great industry were consulted to-day the treaties with foreign powers would be revised and altered so as to give greater facilities for trade and exchange in the products of agriculture than now exist. Reciprocal exchange is the life of enterprise and wealth. A political body can no more exist without it than a human body without blood. You had as well stop the flow of blood to and from the human heart and expect life to remain as to cut off the arteries of trade from communities and expect prosperity to follow.

The wealth of nations as well as of individuals in a great degree is brought about by the exchange of commodities, and our treaties with foreign powers might be so enlarged in their scope as to give greater facilities for trade among the commercial nations of the world, and thus enhance, in a great degree, the value of the products of our fields.

It is in no quarter denied that agriculture is the primary interest in this country, and yet great jealousy has always seemed to be manifested on the part of other industries when its rights are sought to be given or its interests subserved. When we seek to elevate it in a degree commensurate with its importance the country is asked, why should it be preferred to other industries? Sir, my answer is, that there is no comparison between this and any other industry in our land. It gives labor to the forge and anvil; the great arteries of traffic are dependent upon it the world over—the ship, the railroad, and every species of commerce and trade, from the bare-foot vender of matches to the great operations of a Gould or a Vanderbilt. The great manufacturing interests, too, are dependent for their success upon it.

Its utility must be confessed, its importance admitted, and it is singular that it was so long before this Government gave any recognition of its duty toward it. The first distinctive recognition was that made by Mr. Thompson when he was Secretary of the Interior, during Mr. Buchanan's administration, when he appointed a special superintendent of agriculture. That being done, no other effort was made to enlarge the powers and scope of this department until in 1862, when the present department, as it now exists, was established.

In the discussion then of the measure it was contended by the opposition that ultimately an effort would be made to elevate it to an Executive Department and give it the right of representation in the Cabinet of the President. Its timid advocates seemed then to fear to boldly declare that if such an effort should be made it would be justified by the importance of this the greatest of all industries, demanded alike by sound principles of political economy and justice to the chief source of our greatness.

Its opponents also attempted to defeat it by the subtle and adroit statement that the farmers themselves needed no such recognition.

Mr. Speaker, this Government has done less for the encouragement of agriculture than almost any other respectable civilized country on the globe. Go across the waters and look at Europe! Take a glance first at Austria, with but six executive departments, we find that one of these is the "department of agriculture." Hungary, with her nine departments, she has a "minister of agriculture, industry, and commerce." France, where the first Napoleon declared agriculture the body and soul of the empire, with her ten departments, has her "minister of commerce and agriculture." Prussia, one of the most cultured nations on the face of the globe, who in recent years has exhibited her wonderful prowess in her war with France, and now justly regarded as one of the most powerful of all the nations of the world, the home of arts and arms and learning and philosophy, and with but twenty-five millions of inhabitants, we find in her ten executive departments a "minister of agriculture, domains, and forests." Just below her we have vine-clad Italy, not unmindful of the source of greatness for every people, has her "minister of commerce and agriculture." Canada, too, just across our own border, with all her kingly notions of government, seems to be more alive to the interests and well-being of her farmers than we with all our boasted republicanism, she has her "minister of agriculture."

These, sir, are but some of the countries to which my attention has been specially called which have dignified this great industry with a special department to represent its true interests and encourage its laborers.

To make a people patriotic, the government must be just. No people will even love a government which is regarded as oppressive in its legislation, or which, for the want of legislation, seems indifferent to the happiness and welfare of the great body of the people, and this principle should never be forgotten in dealing with our large agricultural population.

Mr. Speaker, it is nothing new to make a Cabinet minister or an Executive Department in this Government, when either the needs or the interest of the country require it. There were at first in this country but five Executive Departments: a Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Postmaster-General, and Attorney-General, at the head of which, respectively, were Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, Henry Knox, Samuel Osgood, and Edmund Randolph. It was many years even then, while there existed these five Departments, before the Postmaster-General was recognized as entitled to a place in the President's Cabinet. The times, however, suggested that in view of the vast interests of the country involved in the postal system, the intricate machinery which was necessary to be put into successful operation for the carrying of the mails for the dissemination of information among the people, and to facilitate trade, and commerce, and intercourse, it was found to be expedient that this Department, which before that time was not entitled to its place in the council of the Chief Executive of the Government, should be accorded one, so that his attention might, through this instrument of the public service, be called directly to the needs of the country in regard to the postal system, and so that by message to Congress, in the discharge of his duty, he might make known to that body what legislation was necessary to meet the demands of mail service, for the benefit and convenience of the people.

The Navy Department was not created until 1798, nearly nine years after Washington became President. But the growing needs of the coastwise and harbor defense, and the protection of our growing commerce on the high seas, suggested more consideration and greater attention. The demand was made and the Department established, with a Secretary of the Navy at its head. The Department of the Interior was not created until 1849, seventy years after the adoption of the Constitution. Its creation was as stoutly opposed as is this bill to-day. Calhoun and Mason and Hunter and Cobb were found in the ranks of the opposition, insisting that such a department was not needed, that the business intended for it could as well be attended to by the other Departments then established. On the other hand, Webster and Davis believed that public lands, patents, and our Indian affairs, embracing treaties and contracts, required more time and attention than could be given in the other organized Departments, and this idea prevailed.

It is nothing new to add members to the Cabinet of the President. Sir, it is a question only of expediency. No man is so wise that he cannot be at some time properly advised on the manifold phases of Congressional legislation affecting the important interests of the country upon which the President must pass judgment. A friendly and discreet adviser near him, and who shares his confidence, is of first importance to the whole country whenever the interests of agriculture are involved. It may be of the highest importance that this officer, clothed with the power of veto, shall be advised by a friend to these interests whose business and whose duty is to give advice under such circumstances, and when treaties with foreign countries are to be made it may become even more important. The range of our markets ought now to be enlarged, not only with the South American states, Mexico, and Asia, but with all the European countries as well.

The sweep of commerce is onward and it cannot long be stayed by any shackles we may attempt to fasten. The transatlantic and Pacific business is demanding cheap and easy connections by rail and water-way across the Isthmus. It is demanded by the commerce of the world, and whether the United States is willing or unwilling, it will be had. And in this great work who is there with a substantial voice in the Government to look after and speak for the interests of agriculture? Of all the people in this country most interested in commerce with foreign powers the farmer is the most deeply concerned.

We find upon examination of the statistics that it is now impossible for our own people to consume the quantity of cotton and leading grain crops annually grown. Where, sir, does and must continue to go this surplus of our products? Of course in the main to the countries of the Old World, where to-day exist restrictions destructive in a large degree of the facilities for favorable exchange, and preventive of obtaining the best prices for our surplus crops.

It seems to me that this restriction which now impairs this free exchange might in a great measure be removed by treaties properly framed for that purpose. Let intelligent effort be given to make treaties by which our products can most readily find markets in foreign countries. Establish lines of ships on a scale commensurate with its needs by furnishing regular and constant employment in the carrying trade of exports and imports. Bring about cheap rates of freight by competition. Let friendly reciprocity of exchange of commodities between other countries and ours furnish a stimulant for the ship-builder. Let him find that where there is now a demand for a tonnage of millions there shall then exist a demand for hundreds of millions. Let foreign countries learn and know that we have garnered in our storehouses the best products of the best soil in the world, which we stand ready to exchange at fair prices for such foreign production as our people need.

There are but few treaties of commerce made but that agricultural interests are vitally involved, and for the want of concern, or for the want of such accurate and complete knowledge which can only be acquired by diligent study, close attention, and earnest sympathy, they have been wholly neglected and sacrificed, or treated with such indifference that practical sacrifice has been the result. Let the ports of other nations be opened and let our surplus products find markets not only at home but abroad. Let a mind be employed trained by study and thought to ascertain how this can best be accomplished. The old maxim "that what is everybody's business is nobody's business," and hence the necessity of giving this work in charge of a man who by research and study has qualified himself for the discharge of the duties of this important trust.

The farmers furnish the most of the money to operate the machinery of this Government, and we can well afford to give them such a man in such a place. In all the parties which have existed, or which now exist, in our country, able, learned, and patriotic men can be found who would bring energy, industry, skill, zeal, and an earnest purpose to accomplish all that the friends of this bill hope for in the interests of agriculture. The expense is a pittance in comparison with the great object to be accomplished and the interests to be subserved. Why, sir, Austria and Hungary in the last annual appropriation I have seen gave in aid of agricultural industries $5,495,125; Prussia, $2,612,340; Russia, for agriculture and public lands, $14,826,184; Great Britain, $795,590; Sweden, $651,735; and nearly all the European countries, great and small, are vieing with each other in giving encouragement to this industry.

Sir, in the rushing tide of business but few persons stop long enough to look upon the vast picture of agricultural industry in the United States: in value more than nine thousand millions of dollars annually to help to feed and clothe the world is furnished by it; in raw cotton producing enough to run every spindle in America and export besides two hundred and fifty millions of dollars' worth for the spindles and looms of Europe. Our grain crops even more astonishing: besides enough for home consumption, our exports of wheat alone in 1876 was 29,500,000 hundredweight; in 1877, 21,500,000; in 1878, 38,500,000; in 1879, 65,500,000; in 1880, 83,000,000. Of corn, besides the hundreds of millions of bushels consumed at home, in 1880 we shipped abroad for sale 49,000,000 hundredweight.

And these are but samples to illustrate the immensity of this great industry. But, if other evidence is needed, I will quote from a recent speech made by Hon. George B. Loring, the present distinguished Commissioner of Agriculture, portraying the magnitude of our constantly increasing agricultural interests:

> In 1870 the amount of cotton produced was 4,352,317 bales, in 1880 more than 6,000,000 bales. In 1870 the amount of Indian corn raised was 760,940,594 bushels; in 1880, 1,754,449,435. In 1870 the wheat crop was 287,745,626 bushels; in 1880 it was 459,667,032 bushels. In 1870 the crop of oats reached 282,107,157 bushels; in 1880, 407,859,033 bushels. In 1870 the tobacco crop amounted to 262,735,341 pounds. The increase of agricultural products was nearly 100 per cent. in these ten years, and in the last year of this decade, out of this vast increase of our crops and products, our cattle exports rose from $13,000,000 to $14,000,000, corn from $43,000,000 to $50,000,000, wheat from $107,000,000 to $190,546,000, flour from $35,000,000 to $45,000,000, cotton from $209,852,000 to $245,554,391, beef from $7,000,000 to $12,000,000, lard from $28,000,000 to $55,000,000, and pork from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000 annually.

And yet, sir, in spite of all this our farmers as a rule are struggling with poverty and adversity. It is a serious question how the surplus of our agricultural products are to be disposed of to the best advantage.

The highest order of intelligence should be brought to bear to aid the struggling farmer in this regard. Elevate, then, this department, and give its present distinguished chief, or some one else as competent, the position which of right should belong to him. Make this a department in fact as well as name. What reason is there for giving every other Department under the direction of the Executive a place in the Cabinet and withhold it from this?

You have made the department; now give it proper recognition and scope to be of the greatest service to those for whose immediate benefit it was intended. It is the nucleus around which all other industries must gather. There should be no ungenerous rivalry, but the rest should acknowledge her modest power, yield to her requests in this regard, and thereby confer material benefits not only upon her but upon themselves as well.

The protected manufacturers surely will not oppose her. She has contributed untold millions to them—taxed year in and year out for their benefit. And it is to be hoped, if not expected, that they will at least ungrudgingly yield this ray of sunshine to gild the clouds of misfortune that so often hang about the efforts of the husbandman, and furnish this symbol of good will.

In your recent tariff convention words of praise of and of seeming interest in the farmers of this country flowed eloquently from the lips of some of its members. You now have the opportunity of manifesting your sincerity by acts as well as words. That sincerity can now be measured by this crucial test. They have been pushed far enough away from the bosom of the Government and put under financial vassalage in order that you may be protected. They have been made to feel long enough that they are political orphans in their own land. Then it is to be hoped that you at least will not raise your hands to strike another blow at the men who have given nourishment to the Government which has given you protection. All legitimate interests should be in harmony. If yours is legitimate, then make it harmonize with those of the tiller of the soil, who has divine sanction for his, and who through the chilling blasts of winter and the sweltering suns of summer toils on, and at the end of each encircling year lays down the fleecy staple of the Southern cotton plant and the fruit of the golden sheaf of Northern and Western grain upon the altar of your riches. Give encouragement to a people who by the muscle and brawn of their manly arms are making submissive for the benefit of mankind the 2,000,000 square miles of fertile plains stretching from one end of our country to the other.

It does seem that there has been a studied effort to degrade instead of elevate the Department of Agriculture. It is known to all of us that the salaries in this department are insultingly, to those who receive them, below those of any other Department of the Government.

The Commissioner of Agriculture receives but $3,500, while the Commissioners, respectively, of Internal Revenue, Patents, Customs, Lands, and many of the assistants who are no more than clerks in the other Departments receive from $4,000 to $6,000 annually. And the heads of the other several Departments receive $8,000 each. This inequality is an outrage; there is no good reason for it. This indignity should not be offered to a class whose business furnishes more than 75 per cent. of our exports and yields more of the revenue out of which these salaries are paid than all the rest of all the classes combined. Sir, not only more than half of the adult male population of the United States is engaged in agriculture, but more than one-half of the wealth of the Union is invested in that industry, and yet Congress gives to it no department worthy of the name, and seems to recognize it only to tax it. It is said there is retributive justice in the moral world for acts of omission as well as commission. The agriculturists, when they see fit, have the power in this land to apply this to the political world, and the time may come when they will exercise it and send to these Halls more faithful servants for more faithful work.

Talleyrand has said:

> Both erudition and agriculture ought to be encouraged by Government; wit and manufactures will come of themselves.

Sir, the wise and patriotic in every age have given encouragement to agriculture. As knowledge and virtue have been shed upon the nations of the world, they have paid greater attention to agriculture and its encouragement; and in proportion to the attention which has been given to agriculture and the respect paid to the husbandman, the bonds of civil society have been strengthened, the arts have flourished, and nations have increased in solid riches, honor, and happiness.

When Rome had reached the fullness of her glory within her realms it was regarded as infamous to neglect or despise agriculture; and it is said "that this sentiment was so generally adopted by the Romans of that time that the most honorable patrician families derived their names from the branches of agriculture which distinguished their ancestors."

Respect paid to agriculture is evidence as a rule of the greatness of a nation. It has been tersely said that "he who can add one bushel of wheat to the increase of a field is greater than he who has ravaged a province or conquered a kingdom."

Remember, sir, that but about one-seventh of the agricultural lands of this country have been made to fructify for the benefit of man. Let us, then, strengthen the hands whose mission it is to unfold the vast internal resources of this land. The giant strides of our people have passed from the East to the West, and before their resistless march the red man has flown from his former hunting grounds and given us undisputed sway; yet the great store-houses of nature all along the route though thus opened are not explored. With proper encouragement, what a theater for agricultural effort! In its bosom lie concealed powers commensurate to feed and clothe the world. Sir, if this country ever reaches the acme of its greatness, it will be through riches drawn from its valleys and its plains, and it is wisdom to build its future structure of glory upon the foundation which God himself has laid. [Applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when Mr. MULDROW's time expired,

Mr. McKENZIE said: I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] be extended.

Mr. MULDROW. I do not ask more than about seven or ten minutes.

Mr. VALENTINE. I feel constrained to object to the extension of any gentleman's time.

Mr. MULDROW. I hope the gentleman will not object to my occupying five minutes longer.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I think there ought to be no objection. My colleague speaks but seldom.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. VALENTINE. I do not object to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MULDROW then resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that all members who desire it may have leave to print in the RECORD remarks on this bill.

There being no objection, leave was granted accordingly.

APPOINTMENT OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he expects after to-day to be absent from the city not to exceed two days. With the consent of the House, Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, will act as Speaker pro tempore during such time. The Chair hears no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, I desire as briefly as possible to explain my purpose in offering a substitute for the pending bill, and also to state the provisions of the substitute itself. Bills proposing to enlarge the existing Department of Agriculture and to make the Commissioner of Agriculture a Cabinet officer have been pending in this House and in the Senate for years. No bill of the kind has passed either House, so far as I remember. I believe that on two occasions a similar bill was voted on in this House upon a motion to suspend the rules, and on both occasions received a majority, but on neither occasion the two-thirds vote necessary for passage.

For years there has been in this House a strong sentiment in favor of the passage of some bill looking to this result. While such a bill has commanded, in my opinion, at all times a majority sentiment in the House, there have been at all times those here who, while voting that way, doubted the propriety of enlarging the Department of Agriculture for the naked sake of promoting the dignity and character of its officials without any corresponding benefit to the country; and while I am earnestly enlisted in the direction of the objects sought to be accomplished by this bill, I believe its most sanguine friends will be disappointed in their expectation of good results to come from it should it pass as reported from the committee.

Take the present efficient and popular head of the Agricultural Department; I am unable to see, and I believe other gentlemen are unable to point out, how anything will be added to his efficiency or to the value of his department by elevating him, worthy as we concede him to be, to a Cabinet position. What I complain of as insufficient is dignifying the name in the absence of additional substance; in this effort to enlarge the Agricultural Department into a Cabinet department, with a Cabinet officer at its head.

Yet, as I said in the outset, I believe this measure in its general objects to be in the right direction. I am as heartily in favor as any gentleman can be of all legislation on the part of Congress that will tend to dignify the agriculturists of the country and promote the success of their employments. Occupying this position toward that class of our citizens, believing that they should share equally in every benefit that this Government is capable of bestowing upon any class, I go further than the Committee on Agriculture has gone in this instance. I deny that the bill as reported does enough, and I maintain that this Congress will fail in the discharge of an important duty if it limit the operations of the pending bill within the scope designed by the committee. The farmers want more. They are entitled to more, and if their intelligent views are consulted they will get more by the adoption of the proposed substitute.

If you go to-day into the agricultural regions of this country and make inquiry of practical farmers with reference to their productions, the fertility of their soil, the success of their ordinary avocations, they will as a rule speak well of them. We know what our agricultural products have done for us in the last few years. We know that so far as the tilling of the soil is concerned, so far as its successful cultivation is concerned, so far as the mere naked question of products is concerned, our agricultural enterprises in this country will compare favorably with those of any other country on the globe. Yet we know that there is a widespread feeling of oppression and depression among the farmers of the United States. We know that they do not by their exertions realize a return equal to half the rate of interest realized on the same amount of money otherwise invested in any section of the country.

Why is it? If you will inquire of the practical farmer he will tell you it is because of the exorbitant rates of transportation. The difficulty of access to market with the exorbitant cost attending thereon is the difficulty of the American farmer to-day. Look at the petitions coming here daily. From whence come the petitions asking for legislation to control the rates of transportation throughout the country? It is true they come somewhat from commercial bodies. It is likewise true that in rare instances, if ever, does a farmer decline to affix his signature to a petition of that sort. Why is it that the large amounts of money appropriated annually by Congress for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country arouse no complaint from the farmers—the men who largely pay the money required for these improvements? It is because of the fact that they realize and urge the necessity for cheaper transportation.

Mr. Speaker, believing, as I have learned to believe, that this Government can do nothing in the line of the advancement of the interests of the practical agriculturists more valuable to them than a proper study and circulation of knowledge with reference to markets, with reference to transportation, with reference to means of affording cheap transportation, I have undertaken by offering the pending substitute to connect, in the consideration of one great department of the Government, the subjects of both agriculture and commerce.

And I differ from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] who described the antagonism between these two interests. I deny that the naked carrying trade of this or any other country embraces in a proper sense its commerce. The exchange of commodities, the mutual buying and selling, is one thing, the actual transportation is another. England to-day commands the carrying trade of the world, and yet we are to-day as prosperous as almost any commercial nation on the globe.

I believe, unlike my friend from South Carolina, that these two things are, as they have always been, twin sisters, and that they ought to be treated as one. I believe that the interest of the farmer is necessarily involved in cheap transportation, in the commerce of the country, in the easy exchange of commercial commodities, which embrace agricultural products with the rest.

Therefore I believe, as I intimated at the outset, that it is a matter of very grave doubt, even in the interest of the farmers of this country themselves, whether we should take a mere skeleton in the form of the existing Agricultural Department, and deceive the country by calling it a Department of Agriculture, thus artificializing its head by calling him a Cabinet officer, instead of putting the two things in one, by embracing both agriculture and commerce in the same general department, elevating the head of both to a Cabinet position, and adding thereby to the usefulness of both. We may in this way do substantial service not only to the agricultural but to the commercial interests of the country, and at the same time accomplish what will soon confront us as an absolute necessity.

The proposition to establish a department of agriculture and commerce, like the proposition to establish a department of agriculture alone, or a department of commerce alone, is not a new idea here. I assert no originality whatever in connection with this bill. Bills have for years been pending here, as I have said, to establish a department of agriculture. Bills have for years been pending here to establish a department of commerce. And likewise bills have been pending, in one form or another, in this House or the other, to establish a department embracing both those interests. My colleague, Senator DAVIS, of West Virginia, has had a bill pending for some time in the Senate which involves the main features of the bill which I have offered here, very similar in substance, if not in detail, and as I have said, other bills have been pending.

I now desire to call the attention of the House to the form of the proposition which is embraced in my substitute. In the first place, the first section provides that there shall be at the seat of Government "an executive department to be known as the department of industries, and a secretary of industries, who shall be the head thereof."

I was struck, in the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] by the fact that in Prussia, in France, in Hungary, and in Italy, departments exist, and have for years existed, practical and successful in their operations, involving both the interests of commerce and of agriculture in one, to the entire satisfaction of those countries, and I trust soon to the successful imitation of ours.

After providing for creating a department whose head shall be a Cabinet officer, my bill proceeds in the following sections to establish two divisions in that department; the one to be a division of agriculture, and the other to be a division of commerce. And I desire to say right here, to gentlemen on the Committee on Agriculture who favor the pending bill, that in preparing my substitute it has been my purpose in no way to antagonize them on their bill.

As the substitute now stands, that part of it which embraces agriculture is simply the pending bill as reported from that committee

I shall modify the substitute, if I am allowed to do so, when it comes to be voted on—modify that part of it embracing agriculture so as to embrace the pending bill as it may be modified and matured by the action of the House. I therefore give notice now to gentlemen who favor the pending bill that I shall adopt it, changing merely its phraseology in order to adapt it to the form of the substitute, precisely as this House shall leave it after it has been considered by sections and matured.

I have no antagonism to any claim reasonable in its character which has for its object the promotion of the usefulness to the country of the Agricultural Department. I am in the fullest accord with gentlemen who seek to accomplish so meritorious and worthy an object. I therefore shall not dwell on that part of the substitute which embraces the pending bill.

I desire in this connection, however, to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, who puts himself here in the strange attitude, as it seems to me, of aiding in the report and support of a bill involving largely commercial industries, and yet spending a considerable portion of his time in arguing to show that commerce and agriculture are necessarily strangers to each other and should be kept so. The section to which I made allusion in asking the gentleman a question reads as follows:

That in addition to the duties imposed by chapter 10, title 7, of the Revised Statutes, the secretary of industries shall cause to be collected and report the agricultural statistics of the United States.

That is the section of the substitute. In the pending bill it is not the secretary of industries, but the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. ANDERSON. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. KENNA. I am reading from section 4 of my substitute.

Mr. ANDERSON. You are reading from your substitute?

Mr. KENNA. I am; but I would rather read from the original bill. I have not here a copy. Will the gentleman be kind enough to send me a copy, if he has one?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will do so.

Mr. KENNA. I thank the gentleman. I will read from the pending bill, a copy of which he has been kind enough to hand me at this moment.

The Bureau of Statistics, the chief of which shall collect and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges, to labor and wages in this and other countries, to markets and prices—

Markets are not agriculture, prices are not agriculture; markets and prices are considerations embraced in the commercial features of this question—to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final market—

What is that? Is the transportation of live stock agriculture?—

to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets.

For what? For agricultural products and for live stock. Are demand and supply in the foreign markets agriculture?

Mr. AIKEN. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I would like to ask a question.

Mr. KENNA. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. AIKEN. Is collection of statistics a matter relating to agriculture or to commerce?

Mr. KENNA. I will answer the gentleman from South Carolina. The collection of facts and figures on the subjects I have just read relate absolutely to commerce, and in no wise to agriculture.

Mr. AIKEN. They do not have anything to do with commerce; it is simply a proposition to collect information, and it has nothing to do with actual transportation or actual commerce in any way whatever.

Mr. KENNA. Agriculture cannot collect that information as agriculture is treated by the present Agricultural Department of this country. The gentleman has found it necessary to resort to the Bureau of Statistics as an organization dealing with the commercial statistics of the country in order to reach the information he desires to obtain.

Mr. MULDROW. Why more commercial than agricultural are the statistics on that subject?

Mr. KENNA. The question of the transportation of live stock, the gentleman will see without inquiring of me, is necessarily a question of commerce and not of agriculture. The question of the ascertainment of prices in foreign markets, and securing information as to supply and demand, is a question of commerce and not a question of agriculture. Whenever you divert the agriculturist into those channels you make of him a trader as well as a producer. He grows his crop as a farmer; but the moment it leaves its granaries it becomes an article of commerce. He is none the less interested in it. He is affected by the cost of its transportation, and by the price it brings. I regret the injustice that is done to the farmer by the assumption that his interest ends where agriculture leaves off and commerce begins. He is involved alike in both. He wants markets as well as products, and his labor goes unpaid unless he can find adequate commercial value and return for his agricultural productions. He is therefore as much interested to-day in that feature of this substitute which looks to his transportation and his markets as he could be in the naked skeleton of a department of agriculture alone.

I have alluded to these features in the pending bill to call attention to the fact that the committee itself, although it antagonizes the substitute, has been unable to perfect a bill upon their own plan without embracing ideas of commerce as well as of agriculture. Their interests are necessarily and essentially interwoven; they are as mutually dependent as two existing interests can be. I say to this House, as I say to the country, that no bill which can be passed can do proper and efficient service to either or both, unless they are both comprehended under the same management, and enabled to co-operate under that management for the promotion of their mutual benefits and advantages. You will aid the farmer more by furnishing him easy and cheap transportation to market than you can possibly do by supplying him second-hand seeds. I read further:

To the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States.

Every provision is a proper one, and I have no objection to any of them. Every provision looks in a right direction. I do not criticise any of them adversely, for they are embraced in the substitute itself, but every one of these provisions, as well as others in this bill, looks identically in the same direction in which the substitute looks, namely, one and the other to services equally promotive of the mutual interests of agriculture and of commerce. This is as it should be, and I favor it; but I want more of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there were no other reason for the adoption of this substitute, a substantial reason is the fact that you multiply offices if you multiply similar pursuits, you increase expenditures by having one set of officials ascertaining all that is provided to be ascertained by the bill in the service of the Agricultural Department, when you are bound to have another set of officials acting in the direction of manufactures and commerce. For, sir, you cannot transfer the bureau from its present connection with commerce matters. If you transfer the bureau which has relation to commerce and its investigations to the Agricultural Department and leave all the matters affecting commerce and navigation in the Treasury Department where they now are, you will have to build up another bureau to take its place in connection with the commercial interests in that Department. You ought to have the transfer as is suggested, and you ought to transfer all the other divisions and subdivisions having relation to the same general subject and the same general class of subjects along with it.

Thus you will preserve the harmony and create no necessity for new and increased expenditures.

I will make no further allusion to the pending bill than to repeat that I propose to embody it in the substitute with such proper modifications as the House may order to perfect it, so as not to antagonize the judgment of the House with reference to that part of the substitute which relates to agriculture.

Thus I have attempted to show to the House that the pending substitute makes a department of industries, divided into two general divisions of equal dignity, with a commissioner at the head of each, the one being a division of agriculture and the other a division of commerce. I shall now, in as few minutes as I can, call attention to the features of the commercial division and then desist from further remark.

Section 5 of my substitute provides, as follows:

That there shall be in the department of industries a division of commerce, and to superintend said division a commissioner of commerce, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

A like provision is contained in the earlier part of the bill in reference to a commissioner of agriculture. So my friend from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON,] it seems to me, is mistaken in the assumption that agriculture will dwindle into a mere bureau or subdivision, and that the commercial interests will overmaster the new department.

They stand on precisely equal footing. The division of agriculture will stand as he makes it stand by the maturity of his present bill. The division of commerce will stand in all likelihood as this bill proposes it shall stand, because I do not believe the House will make any material change in the terms proposed. I do not know how they will stand as far as the details go, but so far as their organism is concerned each has a commissioner at its head separate and distinct, untrammeled and uninterfered with from any source, subject only to the head of both, or the chief of the department of industries, who will be a Cabinet officer. They are exactly equal as dealt with in the substitute.

Section 6 provides, and I would invite the special attention of the House to it, because it embraces practically the whole of the substitute:

That all divisions and subdivisions, bureaus or parts thereof, heretofore attaching to the Treasury Department by virtue of the provisions of chapter 10 of title 7 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Bureau of Statistics, which shall hereafter be known as the bureau of external commerce; title 48, relating to commerce and navigation; title 49, relating to the regulation of vessels in foreign commerce; title 50, relating to the regulation of vessels in domestic commerce; title 52, relating to the regulation of steam-vessels; title 56, relating to the coast survey; title 55, relating to lights and buoys; sections 4801, 4802, 4803, 4804, 4805, 4806, of chapter 1, title 59, relating to hospital relief for seamen; and chapter 265 of the acts of the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, relating to the Life-Saving Service, or by virtue of any law amendatory of said several provisions, or regulations in pursuance thereof, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be parts of the division of commerce in the department of industries; and the secretary of industries shall establish in said division of commerce a bureau of internal commerce, to be organized and governed as other bureaus in said division.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without going into a detailed discussion of the various titles or the sections of the statutes to which the section I have just read relates, I will simply state that it has been drawn with the view to embrace everything—every division and subdivision, every bureau or part thereof, now existing in the Treasury Department of the country which has relation to the commercial and navigation interests of the Government. And that is done for two reasons, one of which I have attempted to give, that the commercial and agricultural interests ought to be placed under one management; and the other that, as the Treasury Department now stands overcrowded, it must have relief in some way. I warn this House to-day that if this Congress insists upon establishing the department of agriculture solitary and alone, cutting off from it the advantages I have proposed, two years cannot pass before you will be confronted with the necessity of building up a division in the department to embrace this subject or establishing a new department of commerce.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is entitled to that.

Mr. KENNA. It is entitled to it as a matter of course, but I insist that there is no necessity for the extraordinay expenditure, and actual harm to both in dividing the two subjects. Why necessitate a double expenditure when both can be established and promoted at a single expenditure by the establishment of one department embracing the two? I am opposed to multiplying federal officers when it can be reasonably avoided.

Gentlemen cannot overrate the commerce of the country. They cannot exaggerate the agricultural interests of the country, and yet there is no single reason that applies to the establishment of a bureau embracing either which does not cover both, nor is there any valid reason which I have been able to discover from a careful study of the subject why both cannot be justly and properly and economically administered under one general management. This plan will facilitate the transactions of such a department with reference to the interests of both divisions, and yet hold them in detail practically separate. The substitute will embrace, so far as the commercial division of it is concerned, all divisions and subdivisions and bureaus of every character now in the Treasury which relate to the commerce of the country.

There is no new legislation in it except in the one particular which changes the name of the present Bureau of Statistics, denominating it a bureau of external commerce. That is exactly what it is, and what its present efficient head, the chief of that bureau, says it is. I asked him not long ago where I could get certain information in official form with reference to the internal commerce of the country. He replied, "You cannot find it at all, sir. It is not gathered or collected in the form of statistics by the Government, but I can refer you to a book compiled by myself and the statistics gathered by my own undertaking, which will give you the information you seek. There is no existing provision for gathering the statistics of internal commerce of this country whatever."

I found that officer to approve the idea of this bureau being denominated a bureau of external commerce, for the reason that the name bureau of statistics is a misnomer. This bill, in addition to changing the name of this bureau to external commerce, creates a new bureau of internal commerce. That much it does, and there is no other affirmative new legislation in it.

It is suggested to me that the bureau of internal commerce would have reference in its duties to all questions of internal transportation. So it would to all questions of internal navigation; to all questions, in its broadest sense, which relate to the internal commerce of the country, gathered for such use as the intelligent head of the new department may see fit to make of it, in connection with either agriculture or commerce. All of the facts whose gathering is sought to be provided for in the original bill are provided for in the substitute.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this substitute will be less expensive than the adoption of the original bill. The only original expense that it will create is that which is already created and provided for by the original bill and forms a part of it, and part of that expense will be met by the transfer and not increased by the creation of new bureaus and divisions. So far as the department of commerce is concerned, embodying therein every division, subdivision, and bureau of the Treasury relating to the subject, it will carry them with it without increasing the force of any bureau and without increasing its jurisdiction—certainly without increasing its expenditure, unless this Congress should see fit to widen the scope of its duties.

These are the substantial reasons which actuated me in preparing and offering the substitute to the pending bill, which I have believed and now believe will not only accomplish all that the most sanguine friends of the original bill may hope by it to accomplish, but that it will accomplish infinitely more by bringing an insight into the working of both divisions as they bear relation to each other to the mind of a single chief, who I trust will be selected with a view to his eminent qualifications to preside over both.

Thus may Congress facilitate the farmer in the growing of his agricultural product from the soil, and thus may Congress facilitate the farmer in the reaching with that same product as an article of commerce a profitable market.

But in conclusion I repeat, speaking at least for the agricultural interests of my own section of the country, that Congress, by uniting both these divisions under one management, thereby securing a general survey of every minute detail by one intelligent head, and the operation of both divisions combined under a single chief, who shall devote his entire time to the interests of the two together, can accomplish a great object that is desired by the farmers of this country.

They will thus procure that information which is so necessary with regard to the markets of the world, the easiest and best routes to reach these markets, and especially the prices to be realized in return for their labor.

I believe that this substitute, if adopted, will promote cheaper transportation for the products of the farm and open for it the way to additional markets. If this be accomplished you will, in my judgment, have done a work not exceeded in value by any done for many years by this or any other Congress.

I desire, if there be no objection, to reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes of his time left.

Mr. KENNA. Then I reserve the remainder, as I may have occasion to use it hereafter.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration provides that the powers and duties of the Agricultural Department shall be enlarged to a Cabinet office. Its purpose is declared to be "the collecting and disseminating of important and useful information concerning agriculture," and also "concerning such scientific matters and industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture." In furtherance of these purposes it provides for four bureaus with specific duties. The first is to be called the bureau of agricultural products, including divisions of botany, chemistry, and entomology. Its chief is required to be a practical agriculturist, whose duty it shall be to investigate the modes of farming in the several States and Territories, and who shall report such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farmer, the various methods of the farm producer, the crops most profitable in the several sections, the preferable varieties of seeds, vines, plants, and fruits; the best fertilizers, implements, buildings, and on all similar matters.

Secondly. It shall comprise a bureau of animal industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection, growth, and use, the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases; and the kinds, races, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

Thirdly. It shall have a bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources and capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And it is provided that the geological survey shall be prosecuted under direction of this bureau and that the secretary may through said bureau institute such investigations and collect such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States as may be deemed of value and importance.

Fourthly. It shall contain a bureau of statistics, the chief of which shall collect and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and in addition all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to labor and wages in this and other countries; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final markets; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products, or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the secretary is authorized to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such credible information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers or other industrialists of the United States.

Its other provisions are brief and declaratory; they provide for the salaries of the principal officers, and for making the existing statutes in regard to other executive offices applicable to this department.

It is unnecessary here and now to enter upon any constitutional argument respecting the power of Congress to create this department. If upon this point there was ever any question, the establishment of the present Agricultural Bureau, with the acquiescence and concurrence of such men as Fessenden, Sumner, Trumbull, Grimes, Willey, and others, has forever removed that doubt.

And, now, why should a department of this character be added to the Executive Departments now comprising the Cabinet of the President? In answer to this inquiry many things must be left unsaid in the time I propose to occupy; but I desire at least to express the views which have impressed me as most worthy of statement.

This department should be established because it is the wish of the majority of the most intelligent and progressive agriculturists in the country. They believe that the business of the farmer receives less direct benefit from legislation than any other class or profession, and especially any class whose principal capital consists in physical labor. Scan for a moment the whole realm of the toiler, and it will be seen that legislation has given less encouragement to the man who tills the soil than to any of the workers in other spheres. This bill proposes in some measure to supplement the lack in this regard.

It is also argued, and I believe truly, that it will tend to incite a pride of profession, without which there can be no great success or progress in any avocation. But a few years since there was an appropriation of public lands to encourage the establishment, in the different States, of agricultural colleges. These institutions, in connection with the influence of the existing Agricultural Department, have, in my judgment, stimulated more thought, and awakened a more intelligent zeal among the farmers, than all other influences combined. I know, in my own State, such a thing as a farmer's institute was unknown until very recently. Now, in almost every county, during the winter months, when leisure affords opportunity, so-called farmers' institutes are held in the various counties, in which from one to two weeks are spent by the best farmers in the community, frequently conducted by one or more scientific men, who devote their winters to this work, in discussing the best methods of farming, and the productions which will secure the largest results. The spirit which has gone forth from these institutes has pervaded the school districts, and discussion and comparison of views have become common throughout the State, the result of which may be seen on almost every farm in the neighborhoods where these associations have been organized. But, after all, any advantage that partakes of sentiment is the least and most remote of all the reasons which may be assigned for the passage of this bill.

Something analagous to this measure has been advocated by the wisest and most sagacious agriculturists from the foundation of the Government. Washington urged in a message to one of the early Congresses the adoption of some bureau or commission to consider and devise measures for the promotion of agriculture. There are ten reasons to-day for such legislation where there was one under the administration of Washington. When the little surplus that the farmer raised was hauled to the market, near or remote, with the farm team; when the great prairies of the West and the vast plains of the interior basin were untrodden by the countless herds which to-day crowd the markets of the world; when not a mile of railway nor a steam-locomotive had been projected; when the prow of a steamer had never disturbed the waters of an American river, not one of the complex questions which to-day trouble producer and consumer demanded either thought or solution. I may illustrate the benefits likely to proceed from the enlargement of the powers and duties of the Agricultural Department by the recital of a recent event which has become historic. About two years ago it was whispered that the vast herds of live stock in the West had been exposed to contagious pleuro-pneumonia from the transportation of diseased cattle from English and other foreign ports, as also from the herds of calves being shipped west from the Atlantic seaboard.

This produced alarm among Western stock-growers. The alarm was made the most of by the newspapers; was discussed in the agricultural journals; agricultural societies passed resolutions suggesting cautionary measures. State Legislatures and Congress were petitioned to adopt measures that would compel the exposed districts to quarantine against the dread contagion. One governor issued a proclamation in regard to it, and others referred to it in messages. Bills were introduced into Congress proposing radical legislation in respect to it. In the mean time wild rumors of the cattle-plague crossed the Atlantic, and the English newspapers, at the great market centers of our foreign exports, rehashed with additional flavor the reports of our own journals; so that, without any proclamation closing British ports against us, we found a practical embargo upon the importation of cattle into foreign ports from the United States.

So disturbing and crippling did this become to this important branch of commerce that it was found necessary to make it a matter of diplomatic correspondence; and to this day no man can estimate the loss and damage to the stock-grower of America and our growing commerce in live stock resulting from the alarm in respect to the pleuro-pneumonia. It is true that the danger was exaggerated, and that it turns out that the dread contagion is confined, at least for the present, to a few States upon the Atlantic seaboard, and to comparatively narrow districts within those States. But suppose that the great agricultural interests of the country had been under the fostering supervision of a Cabinet minister, who could have controlled a well-equipped veterinary bureau, constantly awake to every appearance or whisper of contagion among the live-stock of the nation, long before the alarm had culminated in the damage we have recently suffered the facts would have been authoritatively published, and coming from a distinguished source, backed by scientific investigation, would have effectually silenced alarm. I should say here that the alarm in regard to hog-cholera and the trichina were almost equal to the fear respecting the cattle disease, and contributed to loss and disturbance in our sales abroad.

It is but a few weeks since the French Assembly gave the pork trade of America a "black eye." If the American minister at Paris could have given the leaders of the French Assembly the information which should have been in his possession as a result of tests and investigation by a competent veterinary bureau under the direction of a department of agriculture the country would have been saved the loss to our commerce which touched the pockets of every man in America.

It may be well at this point to turn aside from my line of remark to say that there is now a bill before this House (House bill No. 896, reported by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. HATCH) upon which I hope favorable action may be had in connection with the bill under consideration, which, to my mind, is of more vital importance to the country than the proposed revision of the tariff, the legislation for the control of interstate commerce, or the suspension of Chinese immigration. I refer to the bill creating a bureau of animal industry, the object of which is to protect the live-stock growers of America from the contagious which are a constant menace to their industry and to the entire wealth of the country founded upon stock-growing.

I would prefer a more radical and far-reaching measure than the bill reported by the committee, a measure as effective as House bill No. 5817 which I had the honor to prepare and introduce. Such a law would not only protect uninfected States, but would prepare the way to stamp out the disease where it exists and enable custom-house officers to give a clean bill of health to owners of stock designed for foreign markets. But as the conservativism of some gentlemen and the State-rights scruples of others will prevent the passage of such a law for the present, I accept this measure as a step in the right direction and will trust that public opinion will prepare the way for something more effective in the future.

Have the gentlemen in this House whose ambition is to serve their country in the promotion of its material interests ever thoughtfully and maturely considered the absolute tragedy (no other word fitly expresses the danger) of a contagion that would sweep the cattle trade from the Continent? Bear with me for a few moments while I give you a few figures that will faintly illustrate the overshadowing importance of protecting, by every possible legal barrier, the live-stock interest of the country from any contagion that will diminish values or increase the uncertainty of the business. As shown by the census of 1880, there are in the United States 10,357,981 horses, 1,812,932 mules and asses, 993,970 working oxen, 12,443,593 milch cows, 22,488,590 other cattle, 35,191,656 sheep, 47,683,951 swine; and the entire value of all this live stock was estimated at $1,500,503,807. But I desire more particularly to speak of the neat cattle and hogs, the value of which may possibly be swept away in a single year by a general communication of any infectious or contagious disease. I shall print with these remarks three very interesting and instructive tables, kindly prepared for me by the statistician of the Agricultural Department, whose explanatory note will also be printed with the tables:

The accompanying tables show the value of cattle and swine at farm prices according to the Department estimates for January, 1882, except as to the Territories, which are represented by the estimates of the previous year, the returns from the Rocky Mountain region not being complete. This branch of the subject awaits the completion of the canvass of the ranch cattle and sheep, and the results may be somewhat changed in the report of estimates as published.

These tables show that the estimated total number and value January 1, 1882, of milch cows were 12,611,148, valued at $323,746,646; number of oxen and other cattle 20,626,140, valued at $389,434,185; making a total of neat cattle of 33,237,288, with a total value of $713,180,831. Add to this the estimated value of the hog product, which next to neat cattle is the most general, and regarded as the most reliable live stock product of the farm, especially throughout the West and Southwest, and we will have, of hogs 33,931,400, estimated at $184,772,828, which, added to the value of the neat cattle, makes a grand total for these two classes of the live-stock product of the farm of $897,953,659. Now, suppose that this value should be wiped out by some fell contagion, such as the pleuro-pneumonia and hog-cholera, which to-day hang like a threatening cloud over every farm in America; who is able to estimate the influence of such a calamity upon the future of the commerce, of the social economy, of the industry, and, in short, the destiny of America? The estimated value of live-stock production falls but little short of the entire cereal and vegetable production of the United States, including corn, wheat, oats, barley, buckwheat, cotton, and tobacco. It equals in value the entire national debt. It is greater than our annual imports and exports combined. It is of greater value than all the gold dug from all the mines from 1845 to 1880. It is equal to three times the value of all the silver produced by the silver mines for the same term of years, and nearly equal to the entire gold and silver production for the period named. These facts sufficiently emphasize the loss that would ensue to the country if the greater part of this wealth, which consists in neat cattle and swine, should be swept away or rendered unsalable or comparatively valueless by infectious diseases. And the loss of the stock now living but faintly tells the story of devastation that would follow the general spread of the contagion; as every pasture, stable, and corral would become a medium of infection for the untold years of the future. To provide as far as human vigilance and foresight are able against this calamity is the purpose of creating a well-equipped bureau of animal industry by a special enactment during this session of Congress, which I hope may become a permanent bureau of animal industry in the department for which I plead to-day.

Again, the land interests of the country will be cared for by this department. Ever since the Spanish sailor from the mizzen-mast of the Pinta, shouted "Land! land!" to the little fleet which bore Columbus to the New World, land and the ownership of land, its settlement and its productiveness, have agitated the people of America; and with increased and increasing population making heavier and still heavier drafts upon the productiveness of the soil, this interest in land will demand, and should receive, increasing attention. In Ireland lower rents and more advantageous leases are the demands of those who believe themselves entitled to a larger share of the products of the land they cultivate. This to-day is the question in British politics. In other European nations land reforms are among the issues which distract and divide public thought.

It was said a few years ago by one of the most eloquent orators on this planet that we could have none of the labor troubles in America which agitated the nations of Europe, as our surplus population could always overflow upon the new lands of the West. But when we consider that 500,000 to 600,000 immigrants are swelling the population every year, the room for overflow will soon be occupied, and we will be driven to the necessity of supplying the lack of new lands to settle, by making what we have more productive. The sage-brush plains of the great interior basin will require irrigation; the products to which they are adapted will be discovered by test and experiment; the depth to which artesian wells must be sunk will be discovered; and the sons of men who have carried culture to the summits of the granite hills of New England will make the arid plains of the great interior basin bud and blossom under the hand of a new and varied cultivation. To-day the Agricultural Department should have experimental stations in every State and Territory, and bulletins of observation and experiment should become a part of the literature of the farm. Especially should an experimental station be conducted in connection with every agricultural college in the country.

In this connection I may briefly call attention to one issue intimately related to every question growing out of the productiveness of the soil. The labor problem is exciting to-day the thought and anxiety of the civilized world. It is coming home to us in America. This fact is emphasized to us when we reflect that a vast addition to our population is hurrying to our shores from Europe every month of every year, while a new element has been added to the ranks of free labor as a result of the war. And right here is an unanswerable reply to any objection to this bill on the ground of an increase of expenditure. Within the short time that I have occupied a seat upon this floor some two committees have devoted much time to the consideration of questions intimately associated with labor. One special committee, with clerk, stenographer, and zeal begotten of partisan purpose and ambition, crossed the Continent, called witnesses, and printed a book; and a somewhat thorough examination of it has failed to afford me as much information upon the great questions which underlie the labor problem as could have been gathered from the letters of an intelligent newspaper reporter, sent out under the instructions of a sagacious editor to write the observations of a leisurely tour through the States visited by this committee. But a department with trained experts, and with the intuitions which come from professional handling of statistics, will be able to tell legislators and the country something that might direct to practical legislation.

It is said that Napoleon, in retrospective conversations upon St. Helena, speaking of the incidents of his career, placed what he had done as first consul toward introducing and naturalizing the beet-sugar industry in France above every other achievement of all the busy years of his power. Every new industry successfully developed helps to solve the labor problem. Every plant possessing properties capable of manufacture into food or clothing, for which any of the soils of our various latitudes may be found to be fitted, helps to solve the labor problem. Every remedy or preventive of the numberless diseases common to domestic animals helps to solve the labor problem. Every new process of raising, separating, and saving the gold and silver of the mines, giving value to leads or placers now worthless from small returns, as compared with cost of working, helps to solve the labor problem. Finally, on this point, the very establishment of a great department of the Government devoted to the advancement of the interests of labor will of itself be a standing protest of American common sense against any theory that wealth can be created by legislation; and if there are any agrarian and communistic tendencies in the spirit of this age, a department equal in dignity to any of the executive offices of the Government, founded upon the philosophy that what man gets he must earn, and that to toil and save in whatever sphere is the only hope of man, will of itself be a guarantee of the permanency and glory of the future.

I come next to consider the transportation question. This was a problem of small significance when the farmer hauled his surplus to the market with his own team, or floated it down the dangerous current of an unimproved river in his own flatboat. To-day, however, it is a question of serious concern. It is an easy matter for us to sit here and congratulate ourselves upon the progress made in the great industries of our nineteenth-century civilization, while we ignore the men who turn the wheels of progress whenever they ask for anything like a recognition in the machinery which we call government. A few years since, the State of Massachusetts led the way in the experiment of attempting to regulate the relation between railroads and the people. A commission was created which has devoted years to the study of the so-called railroad problem.

In the end, after years of statistical investigation, legal research, and practical experiment, the commission in substance say: that an intelligent comprehension of the relation which railroad capital bears to the community, coupled with publicity as to the earnings, business, and business methods of railway companies, is the most effective regulator of the corporations. In other words, a public opinion thoroughly enlightened respecting the rights, duties, interests, limitations, earnings, expenses, and savings of a railroad company, is the most effective check upon the greed of its shareholders and officers. So we come back to the point, that there can be no more useful bureau connected with this department than one which will collect, systematize, and give the public correct information upon the railway problem. Properly informed upon this complex question, if the public opinion of the producing masses is not sufficiently powerful to hold in check the greed of the corporation, the sufferers can come to the law-making and law-executing departments of the Government, with such rational, reasonable, and just demands that their wishes will be heard and heeded.

And this leads me to remark that the capital invested in the soil and in the business of farming is segregated, while that employed in manufacturing, in railroads, in banking, and in nearly all the arts and industries by which the products of the soil are changed into commodities for food, clothing, and shelter is aggregated capital. Aggregated capital will take care of itself. Let a bill be introduced into Congress affecting any of these interests, and so far dignified as to be taken up for discussion and consideration by any of the leading committees of this House, and the corridors outside of this hall and the lobbies of the hotels show that aggregated capital is on the alert and will defend itself. But a law may be enacted which will surely yet silently sap the results of agriculture, or legislation may fail to give proper protection to agriculture when endangered by some threatened evil, and the farmers, scattered and separated by the rivers of the Continent, will plod their weary rounds, and illustrating the homely adage that "what is everybody's business is nobody's business," never a lobbyist flies to the defense of their interests. This is illustrated in the fact that no lobbyist was ever seen at the Capitol urging legislation to protect the live-stock interests of the country from the contagious pleuro-pneumonia. Let such a danger menace the banking, manufacturing, or railway interests of the country, and the newspapers would teem with articles demanding legislative action, while individual members of this House would be reminded of duty by constant personal solicitation. There should be a department of the Government to represent these great interests so scattered and segregated as to be in danger of not receiving the attention which their importance demands.

The statistical division of such a department as this bill contemplates will, in my judgment, not only help educate the farmer, but will give him information that will immediately protect and promote his interests.

The statistics respecting growing crops both at home and abroad have heretofore been received and published at private cost. Grain dealers, for their own benefit and in the conduct of their own business, have expended more money to secure statistical information respecting growing crops than has the Government of the United States; and, as it is the interest of the grain speculator to make a showing that will enable him to buy cheap, it is not strange if much of the information disseminated at private expense is fallacious and unreliable. The day will come—and it can come none too soon—when from a well-equipped agricultural department of the Government truthful and intelligible statistical information, not only respecting the products in the granary, but the growing crops, both in the Old World and the New, will be furnished to the producer, so that he can form an intelligent judgment as to the probability of high or low prices in the future. I trust also, and I believe, that advancing scientific knowledge will enable the entomological division of this department to give the agriculturists warning of the approaching invasions of the weevil, the army-worm, the chinch-bug, the cotton-worm, and the Rocky Mountain locust, and that the portion of the country upon which they will be likely to fall will be as unerringly indicated as the course of to-morrow's wind and as the seamen upon the ocean are to-day warned of the coming storm. The day will also come—and I believe its coming will be hastened by the experiments and observations of the scientists in this Department—when the means of avoiding the ravages of the enemies of the crops, either by inventions for their destruction or by such variation of crops as to escape the worst results of their invasion, will be indicated as surely as the course of the storm-cloud can be foretold to-day.

There is another branch of this subject to which I desire briefly to allude. Man is a social being. And to meet his social requirements the tendency of population to seek the city is one of the alarming distinctions of this age. In this regard, so far as my knowledge extends, Americans are conspicuous. The young men of America are only too anxious to get away from the country. They are ready to measure tape in a store, seek a position as a postal clerk, narrow their minds and lives by becoming copyists in an office, brake or fire on a railroad, tend a livery stable, or do anything in preference to becoming a tiller of the soil. How different this from the English taste and English character. In the district which I have the honor to represent there are to-day some one hundred and fifty farmers, recent immigrants from England. They are the younger sons of English gentlemen for whom their English home offers no opportunity or opening suited to their social standing, their tastes, or their ambitions. Last summer, falling in with an English gentleman on a railroad train who was en route from his home in England to visit his son in Iowa, our conversation turned upon employment for the young men of this age. He said to me, "One of the difficult social problems with the English people to-day is, what shall we do with our young men? The younger sons of the English gentry," said he, "who do not care to engage in the professions, and for whom no vacancies can be found in the army or navy, are anxious to own and till the soil, and as the land is all occupied in England they are driven to America or Australia."

Mr. Speaker, I have been interested in watching the progress of these young men in America. Graduates of Oxford and the schools of England and the Continent, they are ready to take the plow-handle in their own hands; are familiarizing themselves with American methods of the farm; and many of them are on the high-road to success. They love rural life; they delight in the country; they revel in the air, the sunlight, and the expanse of their prairie homes. It seems to me that anything which tends to improve and increase the literature of the farm, anything that gives it the character it should hold among the professions, will aid to impress the youths of America with a sense of the dignity of labor, and that the science of the farm is worthy of the best efforts of the best minds. When the farmer's home with its lawn, its trees, its library, and its comforts becomes an inviting place, and when the local grange or farmer's alliance shall become not only a pleasant social resort, but a place of culture and improvement, with its library, its debates, and its lectures, we may hope it will arrest the flow of the young men to the city. Whatever we do to make agriculture pay better, whatever enlarges the sphere of the farm, will help in this direction.

I come now to consider a few of the objections made to this bill and its purposes. It is objected that so far as the direct benefits of this department are concerned not more than one farmer in a hundred will be reached by them. So far as the distribution of its literature and of seeds and plants are to be taken into account, that may be true. But if that is an argument against the department it weighs with equal force against the present Agricultural Bureau. I trust, however, I have shown that the seed business, and even the publication of annual reports, are among the least important of the duties that will be performed by this great office. But, even confining its purposes to these narrow limits, suppose one man in every school district is made a better farmer by the direct effect upon him of the agricultural department; character is contagious; his farm will become an object lesson, impressing and improving every man who lives in the neighborhood or comes within his influence.

It is also objected that it will cost money to enlarge the present Agricultural Bureau to the dimensions of an executive department. This is true. It will not, however, largely increase present expenditures. Aside from the increase in the salary of the chief officer of the department there will be no considerable addition to present cost. The bureaus, with one exception, provided for in this bill are already in existence in connection with other Departments of the Government, and this bill proposes to group them under a natural head. But after all, the great question is whether the benefits which will come from this department will repay the cost, and this question I have endeavored in some measure to answer.

Again, it is said that this department will be a partisan establishment, and that its chief officer will be selected for political service and partisan influence, rather than for his knowledge of the interests the department will be intended to promote, his sympathy with the great industries of the country, or affinity with the toilers on farms and in shops. This is possible, though not probable. It is likely that Presidents hereafter, as in the past, will represent the average common sense and views of propriety of their constituency—the people of America. From the day that Jefferson was called by Washington to manage the foreign affairs of this Government, men of more than ordinary diplomatic skill and learning have been chosen by all the successors of the first President to discharge the duties of Secretary of State. From the day that Alexander Hamilton "touched the dead corpse of the public credit and it stood upon its feet," the Treasury has been managed with more than ordinary aptitude for its great responsibilities. Since a law officer has occupied a seat in the Cabinet, the Pinckneys, the Wirts, and the Crittendens have been the selections to fill that exalted station. So I believe this office, if created, will be filled by men with the sympathies and aptitudes which will fit them for its duties.

It is also said that it is an unnecessary increase of Executive Departments, that the Cabinet is now sufficiently large, and that additional Departments will be more apt to produce confusion than to increase efficiency or add to the dignity and strength of the Government. The simple reply is: Does there remain some great interest which in view of its importance and its needs is not fitly represented in the highest place in the Government? The underlying basis of all our wealth and prosperity is agriculture. We hold this to be a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Yet so far as this interest is concerned most European nations are in advance of us. France, Germany, Austria, Russia, Italy, and other European nations, in some form, have their ministers of agriculture. In respect to encouragement of agriculture we lag in the rear of many nations of the Old World.

Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps not altogether an American characteristic that the modern reformer usually limits his efforts to the field of politics and deals only with such features of the social problem as can be worked into political capital. This bill is not a political or a partisan measure. I believe it will be a step in the direction of widening and improving the sphere and condition of the agriculturists of America; therefore I plead for it.

Mr. Speaker, the creation of this department is just as sure as any future event. It may be postponed to-day, but, whether helped or hindered by this Congress, the demand for it will increase the number and emphasis of favoring voices until its triumph shall be finally assured.

The progress of a social or political reform is slow but sure. It develops in the public judgment by an unerring gradation of upward tendencies. First it is discussed at the fireside, in the field, at the cross-roads, and in the village gathering. The press, catching the impulse of fresh throbs in the public pulse and more spirited heart-beats of public opinion, begins to add its force and fervor to the advancing sentiment. But a few weeks since I turned over the pages of the last January number of the International Review. There were ten articles in the magazine and one hundred and eight pages of printed matter. Five of these articles, covering sixty pages, related to subjects immediately connected with the industrial pursuits of which this bill is the outcome and the expression. The farm has taken an advanced place in literature. It has taken its place in the political platform; it is here, and here to stay. A social or political idea germinates, grows, and matures in the same order and by the same successive stages as does the science of the soul, so beautifully illustrated by the author of the parables, "For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself: first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." [Applause.]

Mr. HATCH was recognized, and yielded a portion of his time to Mr. GEDDES.

Mr. GEDDES Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this measure to enlarge the Department of Agriculture. Although not a practical agriculturist, I have not failed to study and obtain some knowledge of their interests. All but about twelve of the members of this House have been chiefly devoted to other pursuits; yet I trust we have not been and will not be unmindful of the real basis upon which the prosperity of every other branch of business depends. We are most of us sent here by the confidence reposed in us by practical agriculturists, believing, as hey do, that we will guard, protect, and subserve in all judicious ways this great overshadowing and vital interest of our country. As a class they ask no subsidy, demand no special privileges, clamor for no discriminating protection. They simply seek the position before the country and the representation in the Government due to the magnitude of the interests involved, and ask that they be dispensed in the form in which nature distributes her blessings of sunshine, heat, rain, and dew upon all, the just and unjust alike.

The details of this bill under consideration are not what I would prefer. It provides for the creation of too many bureaus with chief officers at the head of each, thus multiplying unnecessarily that class of Government officials. They should be consolidated. The various duties assigned in the bill to the bureau of agricultural products and the bureau of animal industry should be in one department and under a single chief, and the duties of the other two bureaus should also be united and placed in charge of a single chief.

The objects to be attained by the two bureaus as now provided by this bill are not so distinct or dissimilar in their nature as to require a different order or kind of qualifications to discharge the duties. They are of the same character. The same may be said of the other two bureaus. To remedy this defect in this bill an amendment should be made consolidating these bureaus, thus economizing and rendering more efficient the Department of Agriculture.

But I propose to consider more particularly the question of enlarging the Department of Agriculture by making it one of the Executive Departments of the Government and giving to its chief a seat in the council of the Chief Magistrate, now composed of the Secretaries of State, War, Treasury, Justice, Post-Office, Navy, and Interior Departments.

Believing that the agricultural interests of this country are of sufficient magnitude to justify this measure and that the time has come for the change, I cheerfully give it my support. It will dignify the Department and add greatly to its power, influence, and usefulness. It places the secretary as the representative of this great, leading, and indispensable industrial interest in a position where these interests can and unquestionably will be better and more certainly guarded, protected, and advanced.

We cannot overestimate the great importance of conferring this distinction, power, and honor on the head of this Department. The secretary would naturally and necessarily be warmly and earnestly in sympathy with the calling he represented. This would arouse unceasing vigilance and watchfulness whenever questions shall arise affecting materially agricultural interests. He can then, and undoubtedly will, ward off evil influences, and propose and carry out measures to benefit and honor the calling. He would bring to the councils of the Chief Magistrate peculiar qualifications for this great trust. The office would naturally be filled by a man not only of superior executive ability and experience, but possessed of pre-eminent attainments in the knowledge of agriculture.

This proposed recognition of the agricultural portion of the population of this country appears manifestly just and wise, not only as it may honor and elevate that calling, but it must greatly augment the wealth of the country by the increased production this aid and encouragement would induce. We owe our present unrivaled prosperity mainly to the varied branches of agricultural industry. These furnish to all classes of our people not only the necessaries but most of the real luxuries of life; and then out of the abundant excess we supply other countries of the world in such measure as to create large balances in our favor. This balance of trade, amounting to two hundred millions of dollars each year for a series of years, enabled the country to resume specie payment, and to enter upon the enjoyment of our present extraordinary prosperity.

All agree that our abundant crops and other productions of the farms of the country vouchsafed to us by our beneficent Creator for a series of years has proven as valuable a protection to us as the abundant crops of corn to the Egyptians in the days of Joseph. And now whatever misgivings or forebodings a thoughtful forecasting of the future may excite in the minds of men are grounded in the apprehension that this precious source of all our prosperity and basis of all our hopes may not permanently continue so good. As the representatives of all the people no more responsible duty is incumbent upon us than to strengthen, stimulate, honor, and ennoble by every fair means this great interest.

Mr. Speaker, we must not overlook the vast and almost limitless agricultural resources of this country. The rapid increase of population, and the almost inexhaustible supply of land for cultivation justify sanguine expectations as to the near future. Judging from the past we may reasonably anticipate 75,000,000 of population within the next decade. This will give us at least fifty great States. This extraordinary growth of the United States in population, wealth, and influence, and the steady, substantial progress of its people in all that a refined civilization can confer, warrants the assertion that much of it is due to the inducements agricultural pursuits have tendered to all who seek the more substantial blessings of life.

By the late census the population of the United States exceeds fifty millions of people. Of this population about seventeen millions are engaged in some trade, profession, or employment, and of this working population about one-half are engaged in agricultural pursuits. Whether, then, we have reference to the proportion of our working and producing population engaged in the cultivation of the soil or to the grand results accomplished by them, the claim upon the Government for this position in its administration we must acknowledge as highly meritorious.

It is from the products of the labor and capital of this portion of our people that the principal wealth of the nation is derived. Reliable statistics for more than fifty years past show that about 90 per cent. of our exports are the agricultural products of the country.

The total value of exports from this country for 1880 amounted to the sum of $823,946,353, and of this sum $737,826,617 was received for agricultural exports. It will be seen from this exhibit that agriculture brings each year to our country from abroad more coin than all the rich gold and silver mines and other resources of the country. The total production during the last fiscal year of our gold and silver mines, so highly and wisely prized by us, aggregated the sum of $78,600,000.

And yet all must admit that agriculture is in its infancy. Its vast capabilities, beyond what it has yet done, make more palpable the justice and necessity of extending to it the governmental recognition and encouragement so richly deserved.

Contemplate a moment the strong probabilities in store for us in this field of unbounded wealth. With encouragement to agricultural pursuits we must associate inseparably the multiplication of homes, the inducements to industry, the increase of virtue, the inestimable blessing of moral and religious culture, and that high and holy patriotism always found burning in the hearts of men provided with a home where every tree, shrub, vine, plant, and other objects have become endeared to them. Who fails to appreciate and admire the peaceful blessings of home life on the farm, where all the real and substantial joys, comforts, and luxuries of earth may be possessed and enjoyed as the sure reward of industry, economy, frugality, and integrity. The great tendency to village and city life, the willingness to abandon rural occupation and seek the supposed advantages of business in villages and cities is a serious mistake, and its practice a great evil. It should be checked, and a love of country life inspired by holding up the occupation in its true light, as full of comfort, honor, and profit.

But a small fraction of the immense area of land in this country has been reduced to cultivation. We imported in 1880, from other countries, agricultural products valued at $158,337,852, all of which in kind can be produced in the variety of soil and diversity of climate of the United States if we will enable agriculture to reach that degree of perfection of which it is susceptible. With our vast population rapidly increasing, with the marvelous extent of our tillable land, and with the rich income from the products of the soil under imperfect tillage, what mighty results may be anticipated from a wise and proper encouragement of it by the Government.

We certainly would avoid the condition of things that bring to us in the daily press the humiliating intelligence that potatoes from Scotland and Ireland, cabbages from Holland, and butter from Holstein are now being retailed in the cities of this country. This condition of things is not natural or necessary, and should not exist. It demonstrates the paramount importance of a governmental policy that will divert men from idle and inactive life, and from the surplus population of the villages and cities of the country, and enlist them in rural occupations. It proves the infinite importance of investing farm life with all the charms, allurements, and advantages that can be devised. The mistaken ambition of many sons of farmers has led them to abandon farm life and seek higher social, political, pecuniary, and other advantages which they vainly imagined would be found in other pursuits. This pernicious tendency can and should be counteracted by giving to agriculture the honor and support of this national recognition, followed as it will be by the additional charms and substantial advantages that must flow from it.

Washington, the father of our country, as a practical agriculturist, knew that the prosperity of the nation depended upon the prosperity of agriculture. His words of wisdom left on record for our instruction should not be overlooked or go unheeded. In his speech to Congress December 7, 1796, he said:

> It will not be doubted that with reference either to individual or national welfare agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population and other circumstances of maturity this truth becomes more apparent and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up supported by the public purse, and to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety? Among the means which have been employed to this end none have been attended with greater success than the establishment of boards, composed of proper characters, charged with collecting and diffusing information, and, enabled by premiums and pecuniary aid to encourage and assist a spirit of discovery and improvement. This species of establishment contributes doubly to the increase of improvements by stimulating to enterprise and experiment, and by drawing to a common center the results everywhere of individual skill and observation and spreading them thence over the whole nation. Experience has accordingly shown that they are very cheap instruments of immense national benefit.

Mr. Speaker, thus spoke Washington as the President of this nation, then in its infancy. At a still earlier date, after the trials, sacrifices, and triumphs of the Revolutionary war were over, and he was enjoying the sweet and peaceful pursuits of private life, attending to the cultivation of his large landed estate at his beloved home, at Mount Vernon, he wrote to a friend, under date of August 6, 1786, as follows:

> Agriculture has ever been among the most favored of my amusements, though I never have possessed much skill in the art; and nine years' inattention to it has added nothing to a knowledge which is best understood from practice, but with the means you have been so obliging as to furnish me I shall return to it, though rather late in the day, with more alacrity than ever.

Almost one hundred years have passed since these utterances by Washington. The nation has advanced in all the elements of progress toward maturity, far beyond the expectation of the most sanguine of that day, and now we are about giving practical application to his far-seeing statesmanship. We have learned the source of individual and national prosperity. From the center to the circumference of our indissoluble Union the people with one mind and one heart have determined "to beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks," and unitedly press toward those rich blessings so beneficently laid up for us.

The testimony of other ages bears witness to the importance attached to agriculture by the leading nations of antiquity. Both sacred and profane history teach us that most of the great nations of the past agriculture had a representation in the government. Rulers at that day had the wisdom to know that knowledge in agriculture meant increased crops, and increased crops a larger revenue for the Government.

When Pharoah gave permission to the Israelites to dwell in the land of Goshen he said to Joseph:

> The land of Egypt is before thee; in the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell; in the land of Goshen let them dwell, and if thou knowest any men of activity among them then make them rulers over my cattle.

Sacred history also informs us:

> That King Hezekiah trusted in the Lord God of Israel so that after him was none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him. And he made himself storehouses for the increase of corn and wine and oil, and stalls for all manner of beasts, and cotes for flocks.

The ancient Romans excelled in all the practical arts of life, and their agriculture was praised and honored throughout the world. Her people from the earliest times were devoted to rural pursuits. Her most distinguished men, statesmen, and generals gave their influence and support to the cause. Cato, Virgil, and others wrote books on the subject of agriculture embracing the culture of the soil, the different kinds of farm animals, upon forestry and the appurtenances of a country home. Cincinnatus loved the plow more than the sword. Many of her most useful and distinguished citizens devoted their talents not only to the service of the country in war, but to agriculture in peace. In ancient Greece, the cradle of liberty and the home of the arts, agriculture was regarded as worthy of the attention of her most distinguished scholars, philosophers, and statesmen. The history of those times informs us of the influence and teachings of a Grecian colony upon the inhabitants of Gaul; that—

> The new-comers induced them to lay aside their ancient practices, and devote themselves to the culture of their fields, the pruning of their vines, and the planting of their olives, and so great and so happy was the change effected that it would appear not that Greece had emigrated to Gaul, but rather that Gaul had been transported to Greece.

Mr. Speaker, thus all along the track of time the history of our race appeals to us to guard and uphold this interest, to foster and stimulate it by every means in our power, and by our legislation to place it upon the highest possible ground of power and usefulness. We should lead and not follow the nations of Europe in this regard, but we can profit by their example. We find the nations of Europe, with a population not as largely agricultural as this, far in advance of us on this subject. With them the area susceptible of cultivation, the diversity of soil and climate, the population of each, fall far short of what we possess, and yet they have done far more for agriculture. This should not be. Our form of government is such as to make the tillers of the soil, "nature's noblemen," the strong right arm of the nation and with a controlling voice in the affairs of the Government. Not so in Europe. There nine-tenths of the tillers of the soil are forced to remain humble peasants, limited to the necessaries of life, and with little or no voice in the administration of public affairs.

The executive government of Prussia is carried on by a ministry of state, divided into nine departments, the eighth of which is "the ministry of agriculture." This ministry of agriculture was created as early as 1848 as an independent branch of the government, with powers and duties as distinct as the department of the treasury. Its functions from that time were to promote the development of agriculture. With a population of about one-half of this country, and an area of land that would be a little garden-spot in size on this Continent, they have wisely estimated the value of this interest, and annually appropriate for the ministry of agriculture $4,052,875.

Austria has also for many years had a distinct department of agriculture and a "minister of agriculture," under whom are the chiefs of ten bureaus. The work of the department for Austria embraces the highest executive powers on all the various questions pertaining to its different branches, including agriculture, forestry, breeding of horses, cattle, and other stock, veterinary science, irrigation, agricultural education, statistics, and grape, fruit, silk, and bee culture.

Austria, with a population of 37,741,413, and with less than one-tenth the number of acres under tillage as the United States, expends annually the sum of $5,005,767.92 for this department, being more than thirteen times the sum appropriated by the Government of the United States.

Italy, with a population of about 25,000,000, has a "minister of agriculture," whose department is divided into ten divisions, with a chief at the head of each. Her annual exports amount to about $225,000,000, and she expends annually on this department $1,589,900.

France has been foremost in her ample provisions and munificent appropriations for the agricultural interests of the nation. With a population of 37,000,000, about one-half are engaged in agriculture, and the products of her soil are immense from the superior cultivation of the soil and the utilization of every part by the best methods which science can suggest and industry execute. France has a "minister of agriculture" at the head of her agricultural department, to which is appropriated annually $7,271,375.

No better illustration can be found of the wisdom of extending to agriculture a liberal support by the Government than is presented by France. By this policy small landed estates have been built up, and the multitude of small landed proprietors add immensely to the wealth of the nation. With a rural population of 18,513,325, we find 9,000,000 of them land owners, living on their lands, and 4,570,000 farmers and tenants, and the remainder day laborers. As one result of this condition of things there is scarcely any emigration from France. Her people cling with undying love and devotion to their homes, their vine-clad hills, fertile valleys, and their native country.

It should be the aim and settled policy of this country to place this vital and pre-eminently important interest in a light before the world, so that not only our own native-born population, but the downtrodden and oppressed of every European country will be attracted to it and induced to give the country the benefits and advantages resulting from the occupation. Immigration alone is annually swelling our population at the rate of 700,000. What is the peculiar charm and wonderful influence which has gone forth from our country into all the countries of Europe, and which is now drawing their tenantry toward us so irresistibly and continuously? Two leading ideas have spread from shore to shore and have become inwrought into their minds and hearts. The first is that this is a free country, and the other, no less influential, that every one can own his own little farm and home, where he can be comfortable, contented, and happy. This makes it a land of hope to them, and if we do our duty their most sanguine expectations will be realized.

It is to the honor and glory of this country that it possesses and can offer to the people of Europe institutions so full of blessings, and a land with peace and plenty, virtue and safety, throughout all our borders.

Mr. HATCH. I had agreed to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] That gentleman is now engaged making an argument before the Committee on Commerce, and I reserve the remainder of my time for him.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration is one in which the farmers of this country are very much interested. While the principal feature of this bill is the making the head of the Agricultural Department a Cabinet officer, yet its effect will be to secure to this vast industry such recognition and encouragement as it has never before received at the hands of the Government. The passage of this bill is a foregone conclusion, and in my opinion it will prove one of the most beneficent acts of this Congress, and the good results arising therefrom will continue as long as this Government shall last.

Daniel Webster once said all national wealth depends upon an enlightened agriculture. Few will care to dispute this statement of the great statesman. If this be true—and we have to-day, as all will admit, an enlightened agriculture and enlightened agriculturists—it is equally true that the head of the agricultural department of a nation should be an enlightened and intelligent man. Then is not this intelligent man at the head of the great department upon which all national wealth depends worthy to be one of the advisers of the President?

Without in any way belittling our manufacturing, mining, and commercial interests, it is safe to say that without our prosperous and intelligent agriculture none of them could succeed.

But some say that this is a matter of sentiment only; that the elevation of the department will be of no practical use. If I thought this I would not vote for the bill. But I believe that there is no bill which we shall pass this winter will make so large returns for the appropriation made and the good results of which will be so enduring. This department is no longer a simple seed-distributing station with a clerk as its head, as it has been in times past. It should be the great statistical department in regard to the condition and amount of crops both growing and harvested, with its stations so located as to secure accurate and specific information, and also have that information promptly distributed among the people, and also be able to give corresponding attention to the ravages of insects and the contagious diseases of domestic animals, and to take efficient measures to prevent the extended ravages of the insects and the spread of disease. The head of the Agricultural Department should be an officer of such recognized importance in the Government that his reports and statements in regard to subjects under his supervision should be recognized abroad as the authoritative official act of the Government. This recognition alone, in case of false and exaggerated reports being circulated in relation to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, hog-cholera, or any other contagious or infectious diseases would be worth millions of dollars to this country in its influence upon foreign markets.

About one-half of all our people are engaged in agricultural pursuits, and upon the prosperity of those engaged in agriculture depends very largely our prosperity as a nation.

It was the surplus of agricultural products which more than anything else turned the balance of trade in our favor, and rendered the resumption and maintenance of specie payments possible.

While there is a larger amount of capital invested in agriculture than in any other industry, yet owing to the vast area over which it extends and the great number of owners and the comparatively small amount owned by each it is more difficult for those interested to concentrate their powers to influence legislation than any other industry which is of such vast importance. While railroads, manufacturers, miners, merchants, and those engaged in the carrying trade of our lakes and rivers can and do hire men versed in their respective callings to appear before the committees of the legislatures and of Congress, and urge the recognition of their claims and, as they frequently state it, of their rights, the farmer not being able to state his needs as forcibly as the paid attorneys and agents of other callings, and not having the means to spend in lobbying Congress or the Legislature, his claims are ofttimes neglected and passed by.

This was clearly illustrated to any one who attended the meetings of the Committee of Commerce while that committee was listening to the arguments on the bill to regulate interstate commerce. The railroads were represented by the best legal talent which the country affords, who were prepared to present the railroad side of the case in its strongest and most favorable light, and at the same time meet with equal ability any arguments advanced against their interests. The arguments of these learned attorneys were supplemented by the statements of the highest officials of some of the most important railroad lines in the country, who, from long experience and careful study, were able to give a plausible answer and excuse to every charge made against railroad men and railroad management, while those claiming to have been aggrieved by the manner in which railroads are managed came before the committee under more or less embarrassment and in their own way stated how, by what they claimed were unfair and unjust discriminations, their business had been injured. One farmer from somewhere in the central part of the State of New York stated that if he went to Buffalo and bought cattle to feed that he was charged more to carry a carload to his home than was charged to haul a car from Buffalo to New York. And when his cattle were fatted he was charged more to carry the cattle from his home to Albany or New York than he would have had to have paid to have taken them from Buffalo. These extra freights he claimed absorbed all his profits so that he had to abandon the business.

This statement was met by the committee with the information that this was a State matter over which Congress had no control, and by the railroads with the statement that he was charged no more than such services were actually worth, and that the rates from Buffalo were fixed by the competition of rival lines and not by the value of the service. The farmer met their reply by the statement that if he went to the Legislature he was met by the statement that the Legislature had no control of this subject; that Congress alone had power to regulate this matter, and that, whether he was charged more by the railroads than the services were worth or not, the business of feeding cattle, once profitable, was now ruined. Now the reply of the committee and of the railroad men in this case was undoubtedly true, but whether true or not the farmer had no remedy for the evils of which he very justly complained. It was a question of which he understood very little and was not able to hire learned attorneys to argue the question for him. Some representatives of boards of trade appeared to give their views, but they succeeded very little better; they were evidently arguing a question which they did not understand.

But my object is not to criticise the Committee of Commerce nor to find fault with railroad managers for presenting their views in the most forcible manner, but to show that the argument that there is just as much necessity for a department of the Government to foster railroads or manufactures as there is agriculture is not correct; for anything which looked like hostile legislation to any of the great manufacturing intests would bring an equally powerful lobby as the railroads. The railroad and manufacturing interests have unlimited means to hire attorneys and to send experts to Washington to call the attention of committees and members to the consideration of their interests, while the farmers, scattered over vast areas and having only limited means, (for vast as is this interest it is owned in small amounts by the many,) and knowing very little of the way in which legislation is influenced, stands very little chance of being heard from except at the ballot-box. To-day, should any legislation threaten any of the great railroad or manufacturing interests, the hotels and the corridors and committee-rooms of this Capitol would be crowded with their agents on short notice. Should danger threaten the agricultural interests we should probably receive some thousands of earnest protests which would probably reach us too late to do any good, and, even if not too late, would receive but little attention.

While we hear a great deal said about the honest farmer, it usually begins and ends in talk, so far as anything for his special interest is concerned. While Congress unhesitatingly appropriates large amounts every year for testing the strength, &c., of iron and steel, yet it was with considerable reluctance that an appropriation of $10,000 of a twenty thousand asked for was made for the examination of wool, cotton, and other textile fabrics. The Committee on Ways and Means of this House finds no difficulty in preparing and reporting a bill to prevent the adulteration of wines and champagnes, yet has not reported a bill presented to them to prevent the adulteration of butter, an article which every man, woman, and child in the United States is interested in, either as producer or consumer.

The same committee have found time and deemed it necessary to pass under a suspension of the rules a bill to render the tax paid by manufacturers of distilled spirits less burdensome and easier paid. Yet they have not found time to report a bill for the abolition of the stamp tax on matches and bank-checks, a measure which the people all over the country are interested in and anxious to have passed, as shown by the numerous petitions presented to us on that subject. Instances might be multiplied where measures for the interest of farmers and of the people have had to stand aside for measures which concerned some interest that was urgent and persistent in demanding a hearing. But this is not my purpose. This Congress is no worse than its predecessors. And in fact there has been a marked improvement in that respect from year to year. My purpose in making the statements which I have made is to call the attention of the House to the propriety and necessity of giving more attention to the needs of this class of our citizens, one step of which is provided for in this bill, namely, the elevation of the present Department of Agriculture to the position of an Executive Department of the Government and the making the head of the Department one of the confidential advisers of the President.

Twenty years ago, when the present department was created, there was the same objection urged and the propriety and necessity for such a department seriously questioned. Yet the result has fully verified the predictions of its warmest advocates. President Lincoln in his first message to Congress recommends the establishment of a bureau of agriculture in the following language, which resulted in the establishment of the present bureau or department:

> Agriculture, confessedly the largest interest of the nation, has not a department nor a bureau, but a clerkship only, assigned to it in the Government. While it is fortunate that this great interest is so independent in its action as to not have demanded and extorted more from the Government, I respectfully ask Congress to consider whether something more cannot be given voluntarily with general advantage. Annual reports exhibiting the condition of our agriculture, commerce, and manufactories would present a fund of information of great practical value to the country. While I make no suggestion as to details, I venture the opinion that an agricultural and statistical bureau might profitably be organized.

When the foundation for the present Department of Agriculture was laid it was a small affair compared with the present department. The act creating it only provided for a commissioner at a salary of $3,000, and a chief clerk at a salary of $2,000 per annum, with such additional assistance as Congress should from time to time prescribe. There was also appropriated $60,000 for the purchase and distribution of seeds.

Since that time there has been a gradual enlarging of the department and extension of its fields of usefulness, until it now contains as distinct bureaus or divisions for which specific appropriations are made the following: statistics, entomology, botany, chemistry, microscopy, propagating garden, seed division, library, gardens and grounds, forestry, examination of wools and animal fibers, (which has been extended to include cotton and other vegetable fibers;) grape culture and wine making; manufacturing sugar from sorghum and beets; tea culture; contagious diseases of domestic animals; insects injurious to agriculture; and it is now desired to add a bureau of animal industry.

The appropriations have been gradually increased since its separate establishment. There was appropriated in 1862, in round numbers, $65,000; in 1863, $90,000; in 1864, $139,000; in 1865, $105,000; in 1866, $121,000; in 1867, $168,000; in 1868, $97,000; in 1869, $87,000; in 1870, $142,000; in 1871, $26,800; in 1872, $172,000; in 1873, $126,000; in 1874, $127,000; in 1875, $126,000; in 1876, $162,000; in 1877, $196,000; in 1878, $195,000; in 1879, $————; in 1880, $318,900; in 1881, $339,700; in 1882, $434,680.

Several of the divisions are quite new, and have not been established long enough to fully determine their value. Others are probably of a temporary character, and it is expected that they will have accomplished their purpose within a few years and be discontinued. Among these are the examination of textile fabrics, Rocky Mountain locust, and possibly the experiments in relation to arid lands.

But it is probable that other subjects as necessary and interesting will take their place.

Notwithstanding the rapid growth which the Department of Agriculture has had since its organization, there is no doubt that with proper encouragement its growth will be as rapid in the future as it has been in the past.

As the opportunities for getting correct and accurate information increase the value of its reports will be correspondingly increased. When the great extent of our country is considered and the diversity of products raised and the amount of land which is yet uncultivated, it must be admitted that the amount of good which may be accomplished through this department is beyond computation.

The department has only existed as a separate department for twenty years, and during much of this time it has received scanty appropriations, partly on account of the war and the necessary diversion of the revenues of the Government into other channels, and the attention of Congress to more exacting and, for the time being, more vital subjects. Yet to-day, with the exception of the Post-Office Department, no Department of the Government comes so near or interests directly so many of our people as does the Agricultural Department. It does more to convince the people that the Government is interested in their welfare and to attach the people to the Government and to our institutions than any other Department does or can.

The elevation and encouragement of this department will render valuable assistance in obliterating the last vestige of sectionalism growing out of the late civil war. Through its influence men engaged in agriculture all over the country will be brought together to exchange views; acquaintances will be formed which with a common interest will help to bind us together and make us a united, prosperous, and happy people.

The object of the bill before us is the general elevation and enlargement of the Department of Agriculture by making it one of the Executive Departments of the Government and making its head one of the confidential advisers of the President. This, in my opinion, is eminently wise and proper. A man who is connected with and interested in agriculture all over this country, of sufficient business tact and ability, and of such prominence in a country of fifty or more millions of people to be selected for this position, could not help but be a valuable counselor and adviser of the President.

This bill, should it pass, will not only be valuable as furnishing an adviser of the Executive who will represent and is familiar with the needs of a large portion of our people, but it will bring the agriculturists all over this vast country into intimate and harmonious relations with the Government. It will not only unite us as a people, and help materially to wipe out sectionalism and make the prosperity of the whole country the common purpose of all, but it will cultivate a love for and an attachment to the Government which can be secured in no other way.

No country ever prospered long without encouraging and caring for its agriculture. It is a primary occupation. While it is one of the oldest of occupations, it seems to be a natural occupation for man. There are few men, no matter what their position in life may be, but have a desire to have a spot of God's green earth which they can call their own. One is content to have a little garden where he can raise vegetables or flowers, either for his own use or for sale. With another it is a farm with broad, fertile acres, where he can have a home and enjoy himself in raising grain or live stock, or both, and at the same time secure substantial returns in money. With another, who has secured an abundance of this world's goods, it is a place to beautify and embellish, which, from a pecuniary stand-point, seems to be only an opportunity for the expenditure of money without any hope of return. Yet, in either case, it satisfies the natural craving in the human breast to have some of earth which he can call his own. Now, if this calling is one in which we are all interested, and so many of us so deeply interested, is not the Department of the Government which represents it entitled to be one of the Executive Departments of the Government, and its head worthy to be one of the Cabinet?

We are told that duties levied for the protection of manufacturing incidentally benefits all classes of our people by furnishing remunerative employment for our labor and a home market for our agricultural products; that while it specifically protects manufacturing and promotes its prosperity, all classes participate in the benefits derived, and it therefore promotes the general prosperity of the whole people; which I have no doubt is true. Now, while you are doing so much for the direct benefit of manufacturing and incidental benefit of agriculture, suppose we do a little for the direct benefit of agriculture and incidental benefit of manufacturing; which will be the result of increased prosperity of those engaged in agriculture which the manufacturer would obtain in the increased ability of the farmer to buy manufactured articles, and by the increased production of farm products tending to reduce the price to the consumer.

Now, a word in regard to the proposed amendment making the Department a department of industry. The present Agricultural Department is an independent bureau. That is, the Commissioner reports directly to Congress or the President, as the case may be. He is not under, in any degree, the control of any of the Executive Departments. The Department bears the same relation to the Government now that it will under this bill, except that under this bill its scope will be enlarged and its head will be an officer of more recognized importance. Under the bill proposed as a substitute, instead of being elevated it would actually be degraded from its present position. Instead of being a distinct Department it would only be an insignificant part of the new department of industry and transportation, where, among the concentrated influence of the hired attorneys of railroads and Bessemer steel manufacturing associations, it might as well have never been, or it would be as well to return it to the overcrowded Interior Department, from whence it came, and give it a clerkship. As one of the agriculturists of this country, I know whereof I speak when I say that the farmers of this country infinitely prefer that this department should remain in its present independent, though somewhat obscure, position, to having it attached to and made a part of the great, unwieldy, inharmonious department of industry.

But say some there is not enough of this to make a Department. To such I would say that a calling which in 1870 furnished as its proportion of the annual product of all the people for that year, including manufacturing, mining, and fisheries, $2,447,538,658, while all the others combined furnished only $4,396,020,958, is of sufficient importance to be represented in the Government by a Cabinet officer. The returns for 1880 I have not been able to procure, but when published will make an equally favorable showing for this important industry.

But it is stated that the Interior Department is overcrowded and some relief must be had for that. Also that transportation and manufacturing and other industries are entitled to some consideration. Some relief can be afforded by making the Land Office a part of the Department of Agriculture, that is, put it in the same relation to the Department of Agriculture that it now holds to the Department of the Interior. Possibly there are some other things which could with propriety be transferred to the Department of Agriculture. If this does not afford sufficient relief and it is still thought necessary to have a department of industry and transportation, then organize such a department, but do not bury agriculture under everything for which no other place can be found under the specious guise of elevating the Agricultural Department. If you are not willing to make the Department of Agriculture an Executive Department without these additions, then let the Department remain as it is until Congress is willing to do justice by this most important Department of the Government. [Applause.]

I desire to reserve what remains to me of my hour. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan.) The gentleman has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 5820) granting a pension to Hugo Eichholtz.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1513) for the relief of Orville Horwitz, trustee for C. D. De Ford & Co.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GROUT addressed the House. Before he had concluded his remarks,

Mr. ANDERSON said: Will the gentleman from Vermont allow me to interrupt him, the hour assigned for taking a recess having almost arrived?

Mr. GROUT. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas, retaining the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill shall close to-morrow at two o'clock, and that the House shall then proceed to consider under the five-minute rule and vote upon substantial amendments, pro forma amendments not being debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill shall close at two o'clock to-morrow, and that the House shall then proceed to consider the bill by sections, under the five-minute rule of debate on all substantial amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The gentleman included a little more in his request. It was part of his proposition that there should be no debate on pro forma amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the understanding. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HEWITT, of New York, for two days, on account of illness.

To Mr. MCCOOK, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUBBS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

LAWS OF WYOMING TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the secretary of Wyoming Territory, transmitting two copies of the Session Laws of Wyoming Territory, passed by the Seventh Legislative Assembly thereof; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

GENERAL FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. BRAGG. The bill introduced this morning for the relief of General Fitz-John Porter, and which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, is accompanied by a memorial. I ask unanimous consent that the memorial be also referred to the Committee, and that it be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BOARD OF HEALTH AND QUARANTINE.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent to present for reference to the Select Committee on the Public Health a memorial of the Board of Health of Charleston, South Carolina, communicated by his excellency the governor of South Carolina, in relation to the National Board of Health and to Quarantine. I also ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. The memorial is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
Charleston, S. C., April 12, 1882.

GENTLEMEN: The board of health of Charleston, South Carolina, realizing the great utility and successful labors of the National Board of Health in the cause of hygiene and proper quarantine, request that the law of June 2, 1879, defining the duties of the National Board of Health, &c., be re-enacted at its expiration; and they further most earnestly urge that the Sapelo refuge quarantine station be continued for the prevention of the introduction of infectious disease into the ports of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, and most especially guarding as it does against the danger of yellow fever. Yellow fever requires now no pen to force recognition of the consequences of its evil presence.

Sapelo refuge quarantine station receives all vessels bound for ports of the United States which may have a contagious disease on board, and moreover serves as a point to which any vessel in a port of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida may be sent upon which a case of yellow fever or infectious disease breaks out. The quarantine regulations of the ports of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida are framed with reference to the utilization of Sapelo station. It is requested that no legislation be enacted which may in any way interfere with the continuance of Sapelo station. It is requested that Sapelo refuge quarantine station be thoroughly equipped, and suitable buildings erected; that it be made a permanent station and kept open during the winter as well as the summer months.

JOHN HANCKEL,
Chairman Board of Health.

To Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER, Speaker, and the members of the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States.

Official:

H. B. HORLBECK, M. D.,
City Register and Secretary.

CITY OF CHARLESTON, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
April 13, 1882.

I regard the opposition to the National Board of Health as unwise and prejudicial to the complete sanitary supervision, which to be successful must be general in its operation. The Sapelo refuge station is the most beneficent feature of the administration of the National Board from the point of view of the South Atlantic seaports of the Union, which before this wise provision were constantly imperiled by ship arrivals with disease aboard, which could not be refused assistance in their harbors. I earnestly urge the continuance of the National Board of Health and the Sapelo refuge quarantine station.

WILLIAM A. COURTENAY, Mayor.

CHARLESTON, April 13, 1882.

A vivid recollection of personal experiences amid the desolation of the pestilence of 1878 in the valley of the Mississippi leads me to believe that if the National Board of Health had then existed, and with well-equipped maritime quarantine refuge stations, it would have saved the countless lives then lost, and the entire Union the heavy tax then imposed. I trust that Congress will re-enact the law to continue the National Board of Health, and also to appropriate means to equip permanently Sapelo and other stations.

T. GRANGE SIMONS, M. D.,
Chairman Quarantine Committee, State Board of Health of South Carolina.

OFFICE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
Columbia, South Carolina, April 17, 1882.

The act creating a National Board of Health I believe is among the wisest measures enacted by Congress, and should not be abolished. To the States bordering on the Atlantic and Gulf coast I deem as indispensable its supervision and its arrangements now in force to prevent the spread of certain contagious and infectious diseases. I would earnestly recommend an appropriation to fully equip Sapelo refuge quarantine station, and others of similar use, and that they hereafter be permanent stations and kept open during the entire year. I heartily indorse the continuance of the National Board of Health, and trust Congress will make the necessary appropriations for its use.

B. W. TAYLOR,
Chairman Executive Committee.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Columbia, South Carolina, April 24, 1882.

Respectfully forwarded. The views of the petitioners and of those who indorse the petition are entitled to much weight.

JOHNSON HAGOOD,
Governor of South Carolina.

PAY OF SERGEANT-MAJORS, ETC.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6152) fixing the pay of sergeant-majors and quartermaster-sergeants in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

SEARCH FOR THE JEANNETTE EXPEDITION.

Mr. DEZENDORF, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a memorial of the officers, seamen, and marines of the United States steamer Alliance, praying for remuneration for extra clothing, mess stores, &c., purchased during the cruise of that vessel in the Arctic regions in search of the exploring steamer Jeannette, accompanied by a report in writing, and moved that the memorial and accompanying report be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of five o'clock having arrived, the House, in obedience to its order, takes a recess until seven and a half o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The session of this evening, by order of the House, is for debate only on the bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] is entitled to the floor to conclude his remarks begun this morning.

Mr. GROUT resumed and concluded his remarks, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the proposition to make the Department of Agriculture one of the Executive Departments of the Government, however reasonable to one who has carefully considered the subject, will doubtless strike many minds as unnecessary, and possibly some will go so far as to deny altogether the wisdom of the change. The conservative principle in government which looks with disfavor upon any change either in its form or administration is to a certain extent undoubtedly wholesome, but under this principle alone there can be no such thing as progress in human government. And happily for the American people, while they have been suitably attentive to the instructive lessons of the past, they have nevertheless lived and acted for the present and the future. They have never "sighed for the dead past." Remembering with Dryden that,

Not Heaven itself hath power over the past, they have never allowed themselves to become wedded to that blind conservatism which counsels alone with bygones, and whose only instinct is to cling to existing forms. In accordance with the spirit of true progress they have always shown a disposition to adapt the Government not only in its legislative provisions but in its organic structure to the varying and increasing wants of the people.

In evidence of this the fact may be cited that during the ninety-two years since the adoption of the Constitution by the original thirteen States, fifteen several amendments have been added thereto—at the rate of about one for every six years.

The origin and growth of the Cabinet may also be cited as illustrative not only of the immense growth of the country in population and wealth, but as illustrative also of that liberal spirit in government which stands ready to conform itself to the wants of the governed. When the Government started out under the present Constitution there were but three Executive Departments, namely, State, War, and the Treasury. The same act creating these Departments also provided for a Postmaster-General, but his Department was considered only a bureau until 1829, when Andrew Jackson invited Mr. Barry, the person appointed by him to that office, to a seat in the Cabinet.

The act also provided for an Attorney-General to appear for the United States in the Supreme Court and give opinions to the President and heads of Departments when requested; but it was not until 1870 that the Department of Justice was made an Executive Department of the Government, though long before that the Attorney-General had sat in the Cabinet.

In 1798, a Navy Department was created. In 1849, the Department of the Interior was created, and the Bureau of Pensions was given it from the Navy Department; Indian affairs from the War Department; patents and the census from the State Department; public lands from the Treasury Department; also the care of the public buildings and many other lesser duties. From the foregoing brief sketch it will be seen that the increase of the Cabinet from the time when President Washington consulted the three Secretaries already named to the seven who now sit in council with the President, has apparently been in response to the necessities of the people. No regular system has marked its growth; no fixed law governs its existence; in fact it exists wholly without written law, either constitutional or legislative. It had its origin in the practice inaugurated by President Washington of calling the three Secretaries created by the act of 1789 into council, and exists to-day by virtue of a continuance of that practice and by that alone, constituting in the midst of conventions and legislative bodies a notable landmark in the unwritten law of the land.

Thus do we see that the Cabinet, an institution now considered peculiarly sacred, so sacred that any proposition like that contained in this bill to increase its numbers is looked upon as almost revolutionary, really had only an accidental origin. It certainly had no royal birth; nor did it spring into existence full-armed like the Greek goddess Athene from the head of Zeus; but like Topsy it "grew" with the growth of the country. It was made up piecemeal as the wants of the people from time to time found recognition in written and unwritten law.

This bill proposes fuller recognition—even Cabinet recognition—of the Department of Agriculture as representing one of the great interests of the country; really the greatest by far of all our industrial interests. The question presented is whether our agricultural interests sustain such relations to national prosperity and the success of the American system of government as to merit this recognition; whether those interests, or any of them—and they are of great variety—should be better understood in order to the best understanding and wisest possible solution of the current political and economic questions with which as a people we have to deal; in short whether agriculture, which represents in this country $12,104,188,126, not including live stock upon ranches or upon the plains, the annual products of which amount to $2,500,000,000, in the pursuit of which 28,000,000 of our population are engaged directly and indirectly, and which furnished in 1881 of the $883,925,947 exports $729,650,016—a little over 82½ per cent. of our entire export trade—whether this interest is fairly and reasonably entitled to the care and supervision of a secretary; and whether it is asking too much to ask that the Department which has charge of this vast interest shall hereafter be ranked with the Executive Departments of the Government.

An intelligent answer to this question will involve an examination into not only the magnitude and variety of the interests embraced in the department but also the probability whether with enlarged powers and the increased stimulus which will naturally come of an increase of rank, coupled with the larger appropriations sure to follow, those interests will be better protected and more liberally assisted than heretofore. Let it not, however, be understood that any criticism of the work heretofore done by the department is intended.

With the means at its disposal and the authority it could exercise, it has acted well its part and from a very small beginning has gradually grown to its present respectable proportions and strong hold upon the rural class. Let us for a moment trace its history and briefly note its work; and in this review, as often as it appears that the department has achieved a substantial success, let the question recur: If, with its limited powers and scanty means, it could accomplish so much, what may it not be able to do with the enlarged authority and higher privileges which this bill proposes to confer?

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] just now alluded to the recommendation of President Washington concerning agriculture. This was in his message to the Fourth Congress, in 1797. That part of the message was referred to a committee, of which a Mr. Swift was a member. The committee made a report, a portion of which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the encouragement of agriculture is an object highly worthy the public attention, as it constitutes the most useful employment of our citizens, is the basis of manufactures and commerce, and is the richest source of national wealth and prosperity. The present situation of the United States opens the fairest prospect to agricultural improvements, and invites the attention of the Legislature to so interesting and important an object. The lands are usually divided among the citizens into farms of an extent convenient and suitable for cultivation; and the cultivators are generally absolute proprietors of the soil, free from the heavy burden of tithes and the slavish appendages of the feudal tenure which, in many countries, have operated as a great discouragement to agriculture. The exclusive right to enjoy the advantages resulting from agricultural improvements will be the strongest inducement to introduce and adopt them. These peculiar privileges, superior to any other nation, render it probable that by proper attention from the Government agriculture in America will improve with greater celerity and arrive to higher perfection than has yet been known in any other country.

On a view of the state of agriculture in the United States, it will be found that though it has made very considerable progress in some parts, yet there are many important principles and valuable improvements, known and practiced in other countries, to which most of the American farmers and planters are utter strangers. It may, also, with propriety be remarked that the science of agriculture is in its infancy, and is susceptible of much greater improvement than it has yet received in any country. These circumstances, while they claim the attention of the Government, open to the Legislature a new field for the exercise of the power intrusted to them, in which they have the fairest prospect of promoting the public good. To introduce into our own the improvements of other countries, and to lay the foundation for discoveries which shall essentially contribute to the happiness of mankind, is an object worthy the attention of the Legislature of a free people.

Mr. GROUT. The committee making this report also reported a bill providing for a national board of agriculture, consisting of the judges of the Supreme Court, the Attorney-General, the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and War, and the members of the National Legislature. That bill evidently undertook too much and failed to become a law. The subject does not again appear in the legislation of the country until 1839, when $500 were appropriated to be expended by the Commissioner of Patents in collecting agricultural statistics. Small annual appropriations were thereafter made for the agricultural bureau, still under the control of the Commissioner of Patents—and herein may possibly be traced a reason for the singular affinity which the modern patent swindle has shown for the unsuspecting farmer—until 1862, when, by act of Congress, the Department of Agriculture was taken from the Patent Office and made a separate and independent department, and $60,000 given it for the fiscal year.

During the ten years ending June 30, 1882, the appropriations for the Department aggregate $2,438,887. For the same time the appropriations for the War Department were $302,453,744; thus showing that for the last ten years the "sword and the spear" have cost the American people in time of peace more than one hundred and fifty times as much as the "plowshare and the pruning-hook;" also indicating the weary march still left to the world before reaching the millennium. For the same ten years the appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point, a mere nursery of war, were nearly a third more than for agriculture, being $3,124,412. The appropriations for this academy will not be less for the next ten years, and no one will claim they are extravagant or unnecessary.

If, as we are told, "peace hath her victories no less renowned than war," might it not be well for the Government to aid just a little in emphasizing some of the victories to be won in the peaceful pursuits of agriculture? Now, suppose the same amount as is appropriated for the support of this school of war during the next ten years be also appropriated for the establishment of experiment stations throughout the several States, whose only business shall be that of discovery for the benefit of farming—of discovery in the fields of chemistry, animal physiology and vegetable physiology, including the occult question of plant-food and the mystery of plant-growth. These stations exist in great numbers throughout Europe, whose dense populations upon small areas, which have been a long time cropped, present the problem of how those populations are to be sustained. All the older States of the Union are rapidly presenting the same question. A large portion of their lands have been under cultivation nearly two hundred years, and, as the result of the wasteful and ruinous treatment incident to all new countries, are now to a great extent sapped of their original fertility and productiveness. This fact is too well known to require verification. If our population is to be kept good in these older communities—and let it not be forgotten that population is a prime element of national greatness—something must be done to restore the productiveness of these worn-out lands. The experiment stations of modern Europe have shown that agricultural chemistry is equal to this work, the work of analyzing soils and supplying as a fertilizer the elements in which they are deficient. Professor S. W. Johnson, in the tenth annual report of the Sheffield Scientific School, in speaking of the European agricultural experiment stations and of what they have done, says:

About the middle of the last century a light-house, known as Dunston Pillar, was built on the Lincoln Heath, Lincolnshire, England. It was erected to guide travelers over a barren, trackless waste, a very desert, almost in the heart of England; and long it served its useful purpose. The pillar, no longer a light-house, now stands in the midst of a fertile and rich farming region where all the land is in high cultivation. For twenty-five years no barren heath has been visible even from its top. Superphosphate of lime, a chemical invention, first applied to land by the British chemist Murray and brought to the notice of reading farmers by Baron Liebig, has been the chief means through which this great change was effected. Superphosphate over great stretches of English soil makes the turnip crop. Turnips there support sheep, and with sheep the English farmer knows how to get rich on the poorest light lands.

Further on he says:

Chemistry has taught agriculture how to utilize the refuse of slaughter-houses and fisheries, the bones, the flesh, the blood, which but a few years ago was a waste, a nuisance, and a peril to public health. It has found vast mines of fossil phosphates in England, Canada, Norway, Spain, France, Germany, South Carolina, Russia, and Austria, and has shown how they may be quickly and profitably converted into a precious fertilizer. Italy, Germany, France, Britain, and the United States have seen, or are seeing, the productiveness of thousands of their fields decline to a profitless minimum, until lands once beautiful with harvests are desolate and abandoned. But the artificial barrenness of exhaustion, like the natural barrenness of the heath or the sand-down, yields to the touch of science; and in all the older countries I have named the work of reclamation is in full progress, and barring some great calamity of politics or nature, we are confident that the producing power of their soil will never again be less than now, but will increase many fold in the future, until they become gardens in all their breadth and to the very hill-tops.

France had so far back as 1835, in the neighborhood of Strasburg, an experiment station on the farm of Boussingault, who was professor of rural economy in the conservatory of arts in Paris. Both in the laboratory at Paris and on his estate of Bechelbraun, Boussingault had for forty years carried on a series of most valuable researches, whether considered from the point of view of practice or of science. But Moreau was the first station where farmers themselves brought science to their own farms to aid them in farming. The example thus given was so brilliant and solid that within two years in the town of Chemnitz a second station was set up, and of the twenty-two years that have since elapsed, 1867 is the only one which has failed to witness the founding of one or more similar institutions in Germany or the neighboring countries. The experiment station shortly came to be regarded, not as a costly embellishment or an agricultural luxury, in which universities or wealthy gentlemen might harmlessly indulge, but as a most remunerative and necessary agency for the use as well as for the education of farmers.

So much for experiment stations by one who knows their value.

Now, who doubts but that one or two such stations in every one of the Eastern, Middle, and Southern States would much more than pay the expense incident thereto by an increase of the agricultural products and of the value of the agricultural lands of those States? And, further, who doubts but that the Government would be more likely to enter upon some such liberal policy were the department in charge of a secretary clothed with full executive power? But let us a little further compare the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture with the other expenses of the Government. We have seen what a magnificent outlay is made for war in time of peace, now let us see what is done for commerce.

For the same ten years already spoken of the appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors amounted to $67,589,411, to which should be added $475,000, expended by the Mississippi River commission, making a total of $68,064,411—almost thirty-four times as much as for agriculture. Of the above sum, $1,392,000 were expended upon the great Kanawha River of West Virginia, and $1,132,500 upon Cape Fear River of North Carolina, making a total upon these two rivers of $2,524,500, which is $83,663 more than for the Department of Agriculture for the same time. The navigable portions of these streams are wholly within their respective States, and it is only another way of stating it to say that these two States have received from the Government in the last ten years $83,663 more for the improvement of these two water-ways, wholly within their own limits, than has been appropriated for the agriculture of the whole country, and at the same time received $737,000, which was expended upon other rivers within those States. And this has been done in the name of commerce, for the purpose of facilitating an interchange of commodities in the way of trade. Oh, Mercury, Mercury, thou art still true to thyself! This river and harbor business for the last ten years forces the unsavory recollection that whilst thou wast the god of traffic thou wast also the god of theft!

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] undertakes to establish a close relationship between commerce and agriculture, but evidently not being quite sure of such relationship by consanguinity he proposes to seal it by affinity. He offers a substitute bill uniting commerce and agriculture in one department, asserting that their relations are already so intimate that public propriety demands that the union be no longer delayed. But, sir, in the name of Ceres and Pomona and all the other rural goddesses, not one of whom ever had any acquaintance with Mercury, I denounce the bans; I protest against the union upon the ground of incompatibility of tastes and divergent interests. Picture to yourself, sir, an unsophisticated country maiden, fresh from the farm in homespun, consorting with ye perfumed commercial traveler from the metropolis, who wears tight pants and parts his hair in the middle. The gentleman from West Virginia himself, if he thinks of it, will not approve this union. In soberness, however, there is no such identity or community of interest between agriculture and commerce as to make necessary this substitute bill. I think the bill before us more nearly meets the wants of the country.

The total appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the twenty years since its creation in 1862 are $4,394,230. This makes an average of $219,711 per annum and a tax of something less than five mills per capita of our population. And yet with these small appropriations much has been done. A very creditable department building and conservatory have been erected and the building completely furnished, including museum and agricultural laboratory. Many pleasing and valuable permanent improvements have been made upon the grounds appropriated to the use of the department, so that to-day no stranger's visit to the Capitol is complete without a view of those grounds. The department has at the same time performed a great work in the purchase and distribution of rare and valuable seeds.

In 1870 the average yield of wheat per acre in the United States was 12.4 bushels; of oats, 28.1 bushels. In 1877 the average yield per acre of wheat was 13.9 bushels; of oats, 31.6 bushels. In 1877 there were 26,277,546 acres of wheat in the United States. The increase as shown by the above figures was 1½ bushels per acre, making a total increase for that year of 39,416,019 bushels from the sole cause of a greater average production per acre. Estimating this increase at $1 per bushel, it amounts to $39,416,019. The increased average yield per acre of oats in 1877 over that of 1870 was 3¼ bushels. The oat crop of 1877 was 13,312,420 acres, making the increase in bushels 46,692,490, which at fifty cents per bushel makes $23,346,245; to this add increased value of wheat, and it makes a total increase of value in these two crops off the same number of acres of $62,762,246.

The most careful inquiry after a reason for this increased yield per acre of these two grains must result in attributing it to the distribution of new and improved varieties of seed by the department.

If it be suggested that it may be the possible result of opening up new fields to these grains, the reply is, new fields were also opening up in 1870.

But what is still more conclusive upon this point is the fact that the older wheat-fields of the country also show an increased product per acre. For instance, the average yield of wheat per acre in the two Carolinas in 1870 was 7.8 bushels; in 1877 it was 9.1 bushels; Virginia, 1870, 9.6 bushels; in 1877, 10.4 bushels; Pennsylvania, 1870, 12 bushels; in 1877 it was 13 bushels; Georgia, 1870, it was 8 bushels; in 1877 it was 9.5 bushels; while in Minnesota, a newer State, the yield in 1870 was 15.2 bushels; in 1877 it was 18.5 bushels.

As showing the extent to which the department distributes seeds it may be stated that in his report of 1878 the Commissioner of Agriculture speaks of the distribution of over 3,000 bushels of the best varieties of seed wheat, some of it being imported from Europe. Nearly the same quantity of oats and a large quantity of rye, barley, and buckwheat were also distributed, saying nothing of garden and flower seeds.

In further support of the proposition that the increased yield per acre of wheat and oats is due to the distribution of seeds by the Department, the following extracts from correspondence with the department are taken from the Commissioner's report of 1878:

Maine.—Wheat from department is valuable; yields 16 to 22 bushels per acre. Average of the State before only 14 bushels.

Maryland.—Wheat from department is very valuable; best raised here. Yields much above the average.

Michigan.—Wheat from department yields from 15 to 40 bushels per acre. Much above the average, which is 13½.

Mississippi.—Oats introduced by department have been a great advantage to this section.

Nebraska.—The wheat from the department gave great satisfaction, yielding from 13 to 40 bushels per acre.

Virginia.—All are well pleased with the new varieties of wheat from the department; have much increased our yield. Another, the yield ranges from fourteen to forty bushels per acre. The average in past years has been from eight to ten and a half bushels. Another, the pecuniary advantage to our State from the improved oats is greater than the entire annual appropriations for the Agricultural Department.

The fact that the varieties of wheat and oats distributed by the department were obtained from those countries and climates especially fitted to the maturity and perfection of those grains rationally enough accounts for the increase shown, and demonstrates the advantage of a frequent change of seed.

But whether or not this increase of $62,760,246 off the same acreage in 1877 over that of 1870 be attributable to the distribution of improved seeds by the department—and if not some one should be able to name the true cause—these figures, which seem almost incredible, but which are true if the official statistics of the country are true, at least demonstrate how by a very slight improvement of two of the agricultural products of the country her wealth in a single year is increased over $62,000,000; and suggests the question, How can the American people more effectually increase their wealth and add to their material greatness than by making the same slight improvement in every one of the agricultural products of the country? And who believes that this improvement will take place unless means to that end be employed? And yet agriculture is looked upon as a matter of secondary or incidental importance, only two or three hundred thousand dollars a year are appropriated for its encouragement, and the only rank which the American people can afford the man who has charge of its vast and varied interests is that of Commissioner.

Some of the States have what they consider special interests to look after, and as the result, the care of agriculture is left to others. In Pennsylvania it is iron; in California it is the production of the precious metals. It may, however, not be amiss to remind Pennsylvania of the fact, which of course she already knows, that the value of her hay crop alone in 1880 was greater than the value of all the crude ore taken from her iron mines. Her hay crop was worth $44,728,704; her pig-iron production was worth $46,596,860. But to transform a ton of crude ore into pig-iron takes three tons of coal, worth from $5 to $10 according to location. Saying nothing of the labor, call it $5, and deduct $10,440,605, the value of the coal used in making 2,088,121 tons of pig, the product of Pennsylvania in 1880, and it leaves the crude ore worth $36,156,255, which makes her hay crop worth $8,571,449 the most.

Hereafter let not the Pennsylvania statesman worship iron alone, but let him remember that while his State is great in iron it is greater still in grass.

Political economists have told us that only for the discovery of gold in California and the immense annual supply of bullion from her mines for the last thirty years the Government must have failed in its late successful resumption of specie payments. But who has grown eloquent and told us how much California contributed toward the successful solution of that problem by her agricultural productions? And who is quite prepared for the fact that for ten years ending 1880 the value of her wheat product alone was $131,727,797 more than the total value of gold and silver taken from her mines? But that fact is shown by the following table prepared from the last census, which is commended to the careful perusal of those who have supposed that in California gold was king:

Product and value of wheat in California, 1871 to 1880, against the value of her gold and silver mines for same time.

MARCH 4, 1882. J. R. DODGE, Statistician.

But let us return for a moment to a further consideration of some of the benefits which the department, with its limited means, has already conferred. Notably among its successes may be mentioned the introduction to this country of the Bahia orange, with which is connected a bit of delicate romance not here to be given, but which will doubtless make its way into the literature of the country as the Bahia orange makes its way into the markets of the world. A few years ago a package of plants was received at the Agricultural Department from Brazil, in which were placed by the hand of a personal friend of the then Commissioner a few oranges. The superior excellence of this fruit over every orange then known at once attracted the attention of the learned horticulturist of the department, Mr. Saunders, who is ever on the alert for new and useful discoveries in the vegetable kingdom.

It was a new, an unknown variety, and he at once instituted inquiries to trace the fruit to the identical tree upon which it grew. After many unsuccessful efforts, which would fill a chapter, grafts were at last obtained, from which others were propagated and distributed to the orange-growing districts, this, as horticulturists know, being the only way this fruit could be introduced; for while from the seed, in accordance with that old authority, a tree "after its kind" would be produced which would bear an orange, yet such are the mysteries of nature that there would be no certainty that that orange would be like the one from which the seed was taken. It might be sour; it might be bitter; it would almost certainly be something different.

The successful introduction of this orange promises to revolutionize the rapidly increasing orange culture of this country. Reports from California, where it has been quite extensively propagated, say that because of its remarkable excellence it readily sells at the plantation for $40 per thousand, while the best of the old varieties sell for but $10. The moral to be drawn from this story is this: that instead of one horticulturist and naturalist, the Government ought to have a score on duty at as many experiment stations throughout the country, whose sole business it should be to watch nature and learn her ways; and as agriculture does not ask a feast, to save for that interest an occasional crumb as it falls from the table of her bounty.

The attempted culture of tea by the department for the last few years has not yet proved very satisfactory; but the lack of success would seem to have come more from lack of management than from any want of practicability in the undertaking itself. And as long as the people of these United States pay annually $19,782,631 for tea, as they did in 1881, while from the Carolinas to Texas there is every condition of soil and climate and labor as favorable to the production of this article as in those countries where it is successfully grown, they will not believe but that with right management it could be profitably produced here, and the above snug little item saved to the credit side of our balance-sheet with the world.

The people of the United States in 1880 consumed 2,083,087,519 pounds of sugar, of which 264,283,037 pounds were of domestic production, and 1,818,804,482 pounds were imported from foreign countries, and cost us $79,624,317.

We consumed a little over 41¾ pounds per capita of our whole population. Of this, however, we need not be ashamed, for the advance of civilization is said to be marked by an increased consumption of sweets. The child must have his taffy, and the man of years his rock and rye, while sugar is an article of luxury found alike upon the table of the rich and the poor; the poor rarely being too poor to buy and use it. But as a thrifty, independent people, priding ourselves upon the material resources of our country, is it just the thing to be paying this enormous sum annually for sugar, when we ought to produce every pound ourselves? The practical question in this connection is, How can this be done?

In an attempt to answer that question the Government for the last few years has made small annual appropriations for experiments in the production of sugar from sorghum and maize, and these experiments, under the skillful direction of Professor Collier, the chemist of the department, have already gone far toward answering that question. In his report to the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1881, Professor Collier gives as what has been "actually obtained" from sorghum 2,875 pounds per acre, and from corn-stalks 1,059 pounds per acre. But Professor Collier tells us that as yet he has been unable to separate all the sugar from the juice, and that a considerable per cent. is held in solution by some chemical condition which as yet he has been unable to overcome; that some acid or alkaloid or gum or other chemical element not yet ascertained baffles his efforts in this direction. So that while progress has been made it cannot safely be claimed that the point of profitable production of sugar from sorghum or corn-stalks has been reached, especially upon a large scale, though molasses is profitably produced in great quantities.

Now, what shall we do? Give up this undertaking, or keep trying? Let those who are faint-hearted take courage from the history of the beat-sugar industry, which from quite as discouraging beginnings has now reached immense proportions in France and Germany and to some extent exists in our country. This, briefly, is that history: in 1747 Marggraf, the German chemist, discovered the fact that sugar existed in and was chemically extractable from the beet, and communicated his discoveries to the Berlin Academy of Sciences in a paper, wherein he enlarged upon the beneficent influences of his discovery in the expansion of European industry. Nothing practical, however, came of this discovery for almost three-quarters of a century.

In 1786 Achard, another German chemist, conducted his investigations so far that under the encouragement of Frederick the Great he commenced preparations for the manufacture of sugar from the beet, but in the same year that monarch died, and for want of means Achard gave up the enterprise. In 1799, however, he published in a Paris paper the fact that he had actually made sugar from the beet, giving an account of his processes, and claimed that it could be done profitably. This letter attracted wide attention. Discussion and experiment followed, resulting in the establishment of two beet-sugar factories near Paris; but they both soon failed, involving their proprietors in heavy financial loss and establishing the impression that the new industry was, after all, only a delusion. The cause of the failure according to a writer on that subject was this, "that though the juice of the beet was found to contain 10 per cent. of sugar, only 1 or 2 per cent. could (on a large scale) be extracted by the best machinery and processes then invented." Precisely the same difficulty existing with the sorghum and maize problem to-day.

It was during the period of the Napoleonic wars that these experiments were made in France, and they were greatly stimulated by the fact that at that time, though everywhere victorious by land, she had no standing on the high seas. The victories of Rodney and Hood and Nelson had made England there everywhere supreme. In the language of one of her poets—

> Her march was on the mountain wave,
> Her home was on the deep;

and as the result France could not, at that time, even sweeten her coffee except by the "high permission" of England. A writer upon this subject says:

In 1810 M. Deyeux submitted to the Academy of Sciences a report in which he insisted that the beet was France's best hope for deliverance from the prevailing scarcity and dearness of sugar. And that report produced an effect still held in grateful remembrance.
